It is not denied that the public domain should be administered in the interest of all the people, but the policy established by the homestead law under which the people of the immediate locality and the State in which the lands lie are made to realize the immediate, and the general public the indirect but not less substantial, benefit is so deeply embedded in the minds of the people of the States where the conditions exist that they are extremely slow to realize that a great benefit may be secured to them and their children by the appropriation of these lands to a different purpose. I confess that I have reached the conclusion that the establishment of these reserves in my State is to the public good only after a careful examination into the whole question and in spite of preconceived ideas to the contrary. To one who will give the question the thought it deserves it will be made to appear that there are overwhelming reasons why these forests should be intelligently conserved. Not only is it essential to the perpetuation of an abundant supply of lumber and wood, among the chief factors of human progress, but their effect upon climatic condition is equally important. Beyond this is the still more important fact that the destruction of the forests upon the mountain slopes leaves the soil unprotected, and the rains, which should add to the productiveness of the earth and preserve the equal flow of the water, unrestrained by the sponge-like character of the forests and the fallen leaves, become a destructive agency by which the fertile surface soil is carried suddenly into the stream below, filling up the channel, obstructing navigation, and forcing the stream from its banks to inundate the surrounding country, only to be followed by extreme scarcity of water in the earth and in the streams as the season when it is most needed advances.

That the control and navigability of the inland streams as well as the question of overflow of the lowlands are interdependent upon the proper management of the forests on the headwaters is no longer open to controversy. These are not speculations, but are based upon clearest scientific principles. So generally have these facts come to be recognized and so important are they considered to the general welfare that the President, in his message to Congress December 3, 1907, recommended that—

> We should acquire in the Appalachian and White Mountain regions all the forest lands that it is possible to acquire for the use of the nation. These lands, because they form a national asset, are as emphatically national as the rivers they feed and which flow through so many States before they reach the ocean.

Bills have been introduced looking to the acquirement of title to lands situated on the watersheds of navigable streams in the Southern Appalachian Mountains within the States of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Tennessee and the White Mountains within the States of New Hampshire and Maine. In March, 1907, in the agricultural appropriation bill, Congress directed the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate these watersheds and report to Congress, among other things, as to the advisability of setting apart these regions as a national forest reserve for the purpose of conserving and regulating the water supply and flow of the streams in the interest of agriculture, water power, and navigation. Investigation by competent experts has disclosed that the country consumes every year more than three times as much wood as is being grown in the same length of time, and the commercial supply, it is estimated, will be exhausted in less than thirty years.

Recent reports from the Forestry Service show that decisive action must be taken at once to avoid the destruction of the manufacturing interests which depend upon a permanent supply of wood. These manufactures embrace the makers of lumber and building materials, the manufactures of agricultural implements, vehicle makers, cooperage interests, and furniture factories. Last year the cotton-milling industry of the South and East and the different factories throughout the country suffered more than a hundred millions, due to floods traceable to the destruction of the forests. This does not include the value of crops and other farm property destroyed in the lowlands, involving the caving of banks and destruction of levees. These are but a few of the reasons that have given rise to the sentiment which is national in its scope demanding the creation of forest reserves in all parts of the country. Another thing that should be mentioned in this connection is the fact that the establishment of these reserves will operate to prevent the speculation in timber so widely carried on under the guise of homestead entries, and at the same time, if the forest avowed policy is carried out in good faith, such lands as are really best suited to agricultural purposes may still be made available for homes for the people.

These reasons, it seem to me, are entirely sufficient to overcome every objection to the movement, even though we entirely disregard the sad experiences of other nations in permitting the entire destruction of their forests. We learn from information collected by the Forest Service that sylviculture was a subject of interest more than 2,000 years ago. The pathway of civilization has been hewn through the forests. They are first encountered as obstacles and their superabundance regarded as a hindrance to progress and development. As their borders were gradually driven back by waste and destruction, the question of wood supply and building material forced itself forward along with the discovery of the fact that the forest was the controlling factor in the flow of the streams and the fertility of the soil. Nations that had permitted the wanton destruction of their forests set about the slow and expensive process of reforestation. Out of the dire necessity of the situation came the recognition of the fact that the forests are essential and should be regarded like any other crop—fit for the harvest only when ripe, and so managed as to be made to grow again. China and Turkey are the only remaining civilized nations to-day that do not practice forestry. It has been suggested that the standard of the civilization of a nation may be determined by its recognition of the value of its forests. The costly experience of France alone in suffering the deforestation of her mountain sides and watershed should be sufficient to warn all other countries. From the history of this movement compiled by the Forestry Service, we learn that more than three hundred years ago the influence of the forests upon the dangerous torrents of the Alps and the Pyrenees was recognized, and restrictions were prescribed against clearing the mountain sides, and their violation punished by fines, confiscation, and corporal punishment.

These restrictions were effective for a time, but they were swept away by the French Revolution, to be followed by the almost immediate result that the brooks were converted into torrents that swept down the mountain sides unchecked, overflowing the valleys and covering them with sterile soil until 800,000 acres of farm lands were practically destroyed. The inhabitants of eighteen Departments were driven in poverty from their homes. Toward the close of the eighteenth century conditions had grown so alarming that a reaction began, and with the nineteenth century came the movement to repair the damage done by the costly mistake. After several unsuccessful attempts recourse was had to reforestation. One and a half million acres have been acquired, and before the work has been completed over $50,000,000 will have been spent in the work. The changing of the sand dunes on the coast into forests of valuable wood and the transformation of 2,000,000 acres of sands and marshes into a forest worth $100,000,000 are some of the practicable results that have been accomplished. Lands in France which could be bought for $4 an acre before reforestation began are now yielding a net annual revenue of $3 per acre. Thus it is shown that forestry in France has not only removed the danger from floods and sand dunes, but has added many millions to the natural wealth, and a net annual revenue of over $4,700,000. A glance at the statistics compiled upon this subject by Mr. Cleveland, of the Forestry Service, will show that the United States has not exercised its usual spirit of enterprise and progress upon this subject.

France took steps in this direction over three hundred years ago. The first ordinance of Bern for the regulation of forests in Switzerland was issued six hundred years ago, and the Shilwald of Zurich, intelligently managed since 1860, yields an average net annual profit of $12 per acre. Sweden awoke in 1638 to the fact that her marvelous forests could be destroyed by waste and neglect, and appointed her overseers of forest to conserve the supply. Denmark stopped the destruction of her forests in 1805 and began a management along careful and profitable lines. Russia, profiting by the experience of Germany and France, began the conservation of her forests two hundred and fifty years ago. Protective measures were commenced in India at the beginning of the nineteenth century, and Japan enjoys the distinction and profit of having practiced forestry before the dawn of the Christian era. Italy and China furnished impressive examples of what it costs a nation to suffer the destruction of her forests. These facts not only admonish us in no uncertain tones that the conservation of our forests must be undertaken at once, but that we have suffered much by waiting so long to commence. The most important fact, however, to which I desire now to call your attention, is that these natural forests, where scientifically managed, are made to yield a revenue of considerable proportions.

France and Germany combined have a forest area of only 14,500,000 acres, and yet reap an annual net revenue of $30,000,000. The total net revenue from the state forest of Austria is more than $5,000,000. From three and one-half millions of acres in Hungary an annual net revenue of $600,000 is derived. Sweden from the same source nets two million per annum, and Russia from her 660,000,000 acres realizes $21,-

500,000; India, $3,300,000; Japan, $8,000,000. The Forestry Service has compiled a table showing the amount of expenditure per acre upon the national forests of the countries where they are maintained and the net revenue derived therefrom. With the exception of the United States it is as follows:

Country.	Expenditure per acre.	Net revenue per acre.
Wurttemberg	$2.05	$6.60
Saxony	3.00	5.30
Baden	3.58	4.42
Hesse	1.25	4.29
Switzerland	1.32	2.55
Prussia	1.58	2.50
Bavaria	1.99	2.22
France	.95	1.75
Italy		.33
Hungary	.34	.32
Austria	.56	.21
Roumania		.18
Spain		.17
Sweden	.02	.09
Russia	.01	.032

From these figures the significant fact appears that the greatest net revenues are produced where the greatest expenditures have been made. The United States, with an expenditure of $0.007 per acre for the year 1905–6, sustained a deficit of $12,000, and with an expenditure of $0.093 for 1906–7 realized a revenue of $128,659. Now, it is apparent that unless there is some obstacle to successful forestry in the United States that is not encountered elsewhere our forests will in time become a source of enormous and permanent revenue. So far from there being any such obstacle, we are told by those to whom the investigation of the question has been committed that we have at the very start every assurance of success. Many of the conditions which have made expensive and burdensome the establishment and maintenance of national forests elsewhere do not exist here. There are no forests in the world that exceed ours in the value and variety of the woods. We have every facility for developing them to the highest state of perfection and transporting the products to the most profitable markets. Therefore we have every reason to believe that what has been accomplished elsewhere in this respect we can even improve on here. The average net revenue of the nations given in the table above will be found to be something more than $2 per acre. I think no one will dispute that the conditions for successful forestry in this country are at least a third better than the average in other countries. We have now embraced within the forest reserves of this country 164,963,555 acres. If these possibilities can be attained, if we can do in this country what has been done in others under difficulties we do not encounter, then we could derive from these forests the enormous net annual revenue of $494,890,665.

Nearly six millions per annum could be realized from these forests in Arkansas alone. Of course these figures are large and invite the usual discredit with which new and advanced ideas are always assailed, but no good reason can be given why the American people can not accomplish here what has been done by the less ingenious and enterprising under less favorable circumstances elsewhere. To say the least of it, these forests properly managed not only protect the flow of the streams and the water supply in the earth, which is essential to our well-being as a nation, but they will certainly become a source of revenue of considerable consequences. Scientific forestry in this country is of such recent origin that the question of the proper and equitable disbursement of these revenues has not yet arisen, but the fact that a net reurn of $128,000 in the year 1907 is shown, as against a deficit of $12,000 in 1906 upon an increased expenditure of only $0.086, shows how soon this question will arise. In anticipation of it, various suggestions have been made as to what purpose these proceeds should be applied to. It is contended by some that they should be applied to the acquisition of lands for reforestation upon the headwaters of navigable streams where the mountain sides have beeen stripped of their timber and where no Government land exists. If this suggestion should be adopted, it could not, in the nature of the case, be regarded as a permanent policy.

The Forestry Service has not, so far as I am informed, made an official recommendation upon the subject, but I have reason to believe that they would advise the appropriation of the proceeds for the present to the improvement of existing reservations and the establishment of schools of forestry and instructions in the development and operation of water-power plants and the control and measurement of streams. In so far as this may be necessary to an effective inauguration of the system and the education of the people up to a proper appreciation of the possibilities that may be attained by scientific forestry, I am not prepared to say that the idea should not be carried out. But there is an important and fundamental limitation upon these suggestions which I think should be carefully guarded in the very beginning, and which I, for one, will never surrender without resisting with all the earnestness of which I am capable, and that is the equity which the localities, the States themselves, have to the public domain within their borders. As I stated in the beginning, the settled policy of the Government long since established is to convey the lands to settlers for homes and thereby add them to the taxable values of the States. I think no one will contend in the face of various adjudications upon the subject that the Federal Government could acquire lands in the first instance for the purpose of engaging in forestry.

Such a purpose does not come within any of the powers conferred by the Constitution. It is only where the acquisition is necessary to some governmental use and authorized by the Constitution that the Federal Government may own and hold such property. It was never intended that the Federal Government should hold the public domain as a means of engaging in enterprises, or even for the purpose of fostering and protecting agriculture or water power. These are matters which pertain to the power of the States. In the case of Van Brocklin v. Tennessee the Supreme Court said that "the United States do not and can not hold property as a monarch may for private and personal purposes." The property of the United States, like its revenues, must be applied to the payment of its debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare. If the United States has power to acquire the lands proposed to be set apart as the Appalachian and White Mountain forest reserves it is because of the fact that the maintenance of forests upon these lands are necessary to the proper control of the water flow into navigable streams, over which the Federal Government has jurisdiction by virtue of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. The power to acquire the lands for the purpose of protecting the navigability of an interstate stream may find ample warrant in the Constitution of the United States, but if it was proposed to acquire these lands simply for the purpose of improving the forests and conserving the timber supply or developing water power, independent of its necessity for interstate commerce, no one will contend that authority for such an undertaking could be found in the Federal Constitution.

In other words, the acquisition and ownership of lands by the Federal Government must be for the purpose of exercising or carrying out some governmental power or function which is found in the Constitution. This being true as to the lands acquired by the United States, I maintain that the public domain undisposed of should be administered in view of the same governmental power and purposes. The Constitution provides that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations, respecting the territory or other property of the United States." In this may be found authority for the establishment of forest reserves upon the public lands, but if it is to become a permanent policy and vast revenues in excess of the costs of the administration is to be derived therefrom, the question may well be asked, How should these revenues be applied and disbursed? We are told by scientific authority that the forests should be regarded as any other crop, to harvest when ripe and to be handled so as to be made to produce again. This is the business in which it is proposed we shall engage here. It is shown that intelligent silviculture is a highly profitable enterprise. In the old country millions of acres are owned by private individuals and maintained for the purpose of growing wood and timber for market. Now, if the Federal Government can reserve the public domain for the purpose of growing timber for market, why, upon the same principle, could it not fell the timber, clear it up, and rent it out to individuals if such a course was found to be profitable? Why could it not build houses and tenements upon it and farm it upon shares or collect rents?

None will contend that the appropriation of the public domain to such purpose would be within the constitutional powers of the Federal Government. Now, the potent influence of the forests upon the navigable streams furnishes the authority for reserving the lands and perpetuating the forests, but after this has been accomplished what is to become of the net revenue which a proper management of the forests will insure? If the lands are not reserved from entry they gradually become the subject of private ownership, find their way to the tax books and are added to the property of the State in which they lie. I insist that after they have served the Governmental purpose of controlling the flow upon the watersheds of the navigable streams the surplus proceeds equitably should go exactly where the lands would have gone had the reserve not been established. The Supreme Court has said that the power to regulate commerce extends to the control of navigable rivers to the extent of the right to remove dams or obstructions upon the headwaters that diminish or impair navigability. If the destruction of the forests diminish the navigability of the streams, Congress may well make the reservation, but the management of the forests to conserve the timber supply or to develop the water powers within a State should be properly accomplished through the agency of the State government. In the case of Fort Leavenworth v. Lowe the Supreme Court said that the State and the General Government may deal with each other in any way they deem best to carry out the purposes of the Constitution.

Be this as it may one thing is certain, the Federal Government may or may not have the constitutional power to administer the public forests for the purpose of creating a revenue and appropriating that revenue as it pleases, but in either event good faith upon the part of the Government demands that the States should have the benefit of those funds for educational purposes after the costs of administration shall have been met. The 10 per cent which is to be paid into the State treasury under existing law for schools and roads recognizes the principle, but does not go far enough. The Federal Government should have the 10 per cent and the 90 should go to the schools and roads of the State. In my judgment we should early announce the policy of committing these funds sacredly to this purpose. Let it be upon condition that the funds be supplemented by a like sum from the State if you will, but make it in some way available for the schools and roads of the State, two subjects which, when rightly received, are closely akin. Due to the good works of the Agricultural Department an earnest demand has been created for the establishment of schools where agriculture, mechanics, and home economics may be taught, and the youth of the community be afforded the foundation for an industrial education. Some of the States have led out in this direction, notably Ohio, Alabama, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, and the Dakotas. They have achieved most excellent results and have deserved, and in some instances received, recognition at the hands of the Federal Government.

I know that the objection usually urged against legislation of this character is that its general tendency is to obliterate the lines of demarkation between the States and Federal Government. I am opposed to paternalism, and shall resist every invasion of the rights of the States to regulate and control their internal and domestic affairs. I shall maintain, however, that this principle does not contravene the right of the State to demand and receive at the hands of the Federal Government the financial assistance which its enormous powers of raising revenue enables it to afford, or to furnish help through its administrative agencies, for which it is so amply equipped. There is no Member of the House more jealous of preserving the integrity of the States than I. I will not knowingly support any measure that substantially invades this principle. There seems to me, sir, to be little gained in our devotion to this principle by closing our eyes to the fact that many changes have been wrought since their early application to conditions as they then existed. New conditions have given rise to mutual obligations between the States and Federal Government, which, though they were not thought of, perhaps, when the Constitution was adopted, make them none the less wise to observe and none the less binding upon both. They involve no stretch of the Constitution and call for no change unless it be by constitutional methods. I believe in calling upon the Central Government for nothing that the States can do for themselves, but as our social and industrial conditions progress in their wonderful development, we are met with broader, more complex, and more comprehensive problems. Necessarily, more arise which, in the proper and efficient administration of government, call for the exercise of both State and Federal powers.

I for one regard the fact that both may be called into exercise as a source of governmental strength and not of weakness. The improvements in transportation and communication which have been developed in the last half century have revolutionized the commercial and industrial system of the whole country and made it impossible for the States to deal single-handed and alone with many of the problems presented thereby. There is no policy more clearly recognized or more firmly established than that of Government aid to the schools of the States. This is fully shown in the Congressional land-grant act of 1862 and the act of 1890, appropriating to each of the States $25,000 for educational purposes. It seems to me to be peculiarly appropriate that the proceeds arising from the lands which are otherwise held to become homes for American citizens should be applied to the education of the American youth in the direction of the agriculturist and the home builder. I have heard and read something of the reluctance of the American youth to enter the military service of the country. We are being urged from certain quarters to make the Army more attractive, in order that enlistments may be easier. If I remember correctly, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs stated on the floor of the House a few days ago that the Army was 22,000 short of its authorized strength. I for one am ever ready to make ample provision for the necessities of sufficient military force to form the nucleus about which the American citizen may rally in time of danger and defend this country and overcome her foes; but I want to say that it must not be forgotten that supplies by which our armies are to be fed, clothed, and maintained, and our ships paid, our pension rolls met, must be produced by another army that pitches its tents on the country side and gives constant battle to the elements with plow and with blade.

Let them fail to keep step with the advancing seasons but for a day, and want and famine threaten the prosperity of the realm. The failure of their labors for a season means more to this Republic than the advance of a foreign foe upon her borders. Recruits, sir, for this army have been hard to enlist, and to-day it is millions short of its authorized strength. Something must be done to make its ranks more attractive. The rural districts must be made more inviting. Agriculture, home economics, and the mechanical arts must be elevated to the dignity of the professions. The welfare, the peace, the strength, and stability of this nation depend more upon contentment and prosperity in the rural home than upon all other conditions combined. If country life in America is made so inviting and remunerating as to turn back the flow from the farm to the overcrowded cities, our greatest cause of disturbance in social conditions will have been removed. Better than this, it will bring about by proper and normal methods that equal distribution of wealth, without which no people can attain their highest development or long continue patriotic. If we are to preserve the typical American, the greatest product of the human family, we must protect and perpetuate the environment by which he was produced. We have spent worlds of money upon the Army and Navy, and this is not saying we have spent too much. We have erected monumental buildings in almost every city and fair-sized town in the country, but we have contented the rural districts with little more than a package of garden seed and a Government publication.

The Agricultural Department, established with many misgivings, has accomplished more on less money than any other Department of the Government. They have reduced agriculture to a science and disclosed in it possibilities that invite the highest aspirations of the American youth. Realizing that the best results can not be attained without a rural population, educated along the line they are to travel and up to a proper appreciation of the beauties that surround them, they are urging upon the country the necessity of taking substantial steps toward providing for the rural youth this character of education. Much has been done by the States and National Government to provide for the establishment of colleges and universities throughout the country. This has largely been supplemented by denominational institutions and munificent endowment by philanthropic individuals. We are not suffering for want of facilities for higher education in æsthetical and classical learning. This is essential to our well-being, and I am proud that it is true, but what I wish to impress is that education should be so imparted as to serve some other purpose than to hold out to the farmer boy the allurement of becoming President of the United States or attaining renown and distinction. Let him be taught that there is no field of activity in which education of the right sort can be employed to a better advantage than in agriculture and the industrial arts. Upon all sides there are evidences of a return of the original idea that the farm should produce the food, raiment, and implements demanded by its own necessities. The cheap factory-made articles that have so long flooded the country do not meet every demand.

A plainer and more substantial furniture is sought, and creations in wood, iron, and brass are engaging the attention of the artisan. The handicrafts that afford opportunity for originality and development of talent, cut off by the automatic and monotonous processes of the factory, are beginning to afford once more a profitable and engaging vocation. The rural districts are full of opportunities which only need the education which pertains to such things to realize and appreciate. The tendency of the age has been in the direction of grand achievement and great things. The busy marts of trade and commerce, the domain of finance, and the dizzy heights of professional and political fame have been held out to the youth of our country as the only fields worthy of his ambitions or in which his labors would meet with the highest reward. This is wrong. It has driven the farmer boy from the old homestead, where opportunities of the highest order lay within his touch, to take his place as an obscure atom in the mass of humanity that crowd and trample upon each other in the great cities of the land. Let us open his eyes to the beauties and the possibilities and the independence that may be his in the realms remote from towns. Mr. Chairman, for this purpose these hills, these streams, and these forests are his.

THE RIGHTS OF THE STATE IN NATIONAL FORESTS.

The National Government has long been committed to the policy of appropriating the public domain to the people for homes. In this way the West has been settled; the lands have been added to the taxable values of the States and produced the funds by which roads and schools have been maintained. If the public domain is to be reserved in forests that produce a revenue, the net proceeds should go to the States for the maintenance for agricultural schools for the people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, when I had the floor during the day I intended to ask unanimous consent, in a general way, to include in my remarks data that I did not wish to take the time of the House to read on the floor, but it seems from the stenographer's notes that the language in which the request was framed might possibly be construed to apply only to the special topic that I was immediately discussing at the time. I hope the House will not object to having the request expressed in the terms in which it was intended.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, it was impossible for me to hear the request of the gentleman from Kansas, because he spoke in such a low tone of voice. I would like to know what the request is?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], as the Chair understands it, asks that the stenographer's notes may be corrected to express his request for the unanimous consent, which was granted.

Mr. SULZER. If it were granted, why do not the stenographer's notes show it?

Mr. SCOTT. I was, perhaps, unfortunate in expressing myself, I have just explained to the House, and the language I used might possibly bear the interpretation of applying only to the particular bureau which I was discussing at the time.

I desired, of course, permission to include in my remarks data relating to any part of the bill, which I did not wish to take the time of the House to read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BURLESON. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] that some of this data was requested by other Members who were listening to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT]. They requested he put certain information in his speech, and he told them he would.

Mr. SULZER. The point I desire information about is this: If the data the gentleman now wants to insert in the RECORD as a part of his speech is relative to the bill under discussion?

Mr. SCOTT. Absolutely. I had intended to use it as a part of my speech, but so much of my time was taken up by inquiries that I did not feel like reading it.

Mr. SULZER. Another interrogatory, and that is: If this request is granted by the House, does the gentleman think the Member from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will move to-morrow to strike it out?

Mr. SCOTT. I am willing to take my chances on that.

Mr. SULZER. Then, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes that I expect to occupy, I wish to direct attention to a bill (H. R. 19247) introduced by me, and which I will incorporate in my remarks, which provides that a label giving the date of inspection shall be attached to every can containing meat products inspected and passed by the Government:

A bill (H. R. 19247) to provide for the labeling of cans, pots, tins, and other receptacles containing meat or meat food products when hermetically sealed and prepared for foreign or interstate commerce.

Be it enacted, etc., That when any meat or meat food products, prepared for interstate or foreign commerce, which has been inspected as provided by the "Act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907," approved June 30, 1906, and marked "Inspected and passed," shall be deposited and hermetically sealed in any can, pot, tin, or other receptacle in any establishment where inspection under the provisions of said act is maintained, the person, firm, or corporation preparing said products shall cause a label to be attached to said can, pot, tin, or other receptacle, which label shall state the date when the contents were placed therein and that the contents thereof have been "Inspected and passed" under the provisions of said act. And no inspection and examination of meat or meat food products deposited and hermetically sealed in any can, pot, tin, or other receptacle in any establishment where inspection is maintained under said act shall be deemed to be complete until such meat or meat food products have been hermetically sealed in said can, pot, tin, or other receptacle; and no meat or meat food products shall be sold or offered for sale by any person, firm, or corporation in interstate commerce under any false or deceptive name, but established trade name or names which are usual to such products and which shall have the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture are permitted.

In offering this amendment to the meat-inspection law I fully appreciate that I am approaching dangerous ground, ground so sacred to a certain powerful interest. I have not forgotten the fierce contest that took place here two years ago between the American people and the beef trust. On one side stood 99 per cent of the American people backed up by our worthy President, the most fearless, conscientious, resolute, and well-meaning President that ever occupied that chair; the people quietly in their homes, attending to their own affairs, writing letters to their Members, and praying and pleading for Congress to enact some law to protect the meat consumer and the meat producer against fraud and deception; on the other side the beef trust, with its large army of representatives, or so-called "lobbyists," here in Washington, and, indeed, they were here in large numbers. It has been said that every hotel and boarding house was filled from basement to garret with these exceedingly polite and generous men and women, and that you could hardly board a street car without running into a number of them hanging onto the straps. It has been said that they were as thick here as field mice are in the wheat fields of Colorado at stacking time. Mr. Chairman, they were swarming in and around this Capitol as thick as blackbirds out West in the springtime. Indeed they were here in large numbers. It was an incident long to be remembered, one that has been characterized as the most shameful and humiliating spectacle ever witnessed.

If you will read the RECORD, you will find that Congress was overwhelmed and overpowered, and that surrender was made necessary by sinister and bad motives, and through the influences of this trust and as a result the trust got what it wanted, and the people were left to pay $3,000,000 annually and suffer, which is a sufficient and striking illustration of the dangerous power to which this powerful and greedy trust had attained in this country.

Gentlemen, when I think of the influences and the power exercised by this trust in the past, when I think of its activity in the past and the present, when I think of the results, when I think of the unsuccessful efforts on the part of a few in the interest of a "square deal" for the meat consumer and the meat producer, and when I think of the audacity, the effrontery, and the extraordinary methods that have been employed by a trust recognized as the most powerful in politics and elsewhere, I may be taking great chances in introducing this amendment, for it has been said that a candidate for office in a district or State in which this trust operates in politics, without its influence and support, would be as helpless as a cat without claws in the burning regions below. But, gentlemen, as I do not owe my position in Congress to them, I offer this amendment, and will support it with what ability and strength I possess, regardless of consequences. I offer it as a sworn duty, as it concerns the life and health not only of the American people, but to a large extent the people of the world.

Mr. Chairman, under present laws the meat products put up in cans, which may be as old as the hills, spoiled, poisoned, putrid, and as rotten as can be, by reason of age, may be sold without hindrance of law, thereby sending many to an early grave. How long is this to be continued? The answer is, until Congress acts.

If our markets for these products at home and abroad are to be maintained, this legislation is required. If our integrity, dignity, and standing with the world is to be maintained, this legislation is required. Good policy requires it; common sense and justice demands it.

Is this Congress to turn a deaf ear to this just demand for legislation that is desired by 99 per cent of the American people—by every man and woman who believes in conserving the life and health of human beings; a demand coming not only from the cattle raisers of this country, but from the merchants and the consumers of meat products—in fact, everybody who believes in the preservation of human life, integrity, justice, and a square deal—legislation that is necessary in order to maintain our markets, our dignity, and standing, to protect the consumers against imposition, deception, and fraud, and give everybody the information which he has a right to—that is, that he may know exactly what he is buying and eating? Have not the people a right to know what they are paying their money for when they purchase a can of food product? If so, why not legislate so as to put an honest stamp of approval on the American product, and thus not only protect the consumer against imposition and fraud, but to foster our foreign trade?

The spirit of our pure-food laws is that all canned food products shall be sold for just what they are, and that no misbranding and deception shall be tolerated. Why, then, not put the date of inspection upon all cans? The beef trust says no. That is what they said two years ago when this matter was under consideration and when the representatives of the trust and so-called "lobbyists" were here. Their contention at that time was that the contents of cans five or even fifteen years old was just as good as that five days old.

Will anyone believe it? No, gentlemen, the argument is so absurd that it would hardly seem worthy of any consideration. But as this is about the only argument produced, let us look into it. If the contents of a can are as good and as salable when five or ten years old as when five or ten days old, why not when twenty-five or fifty years old? If the contents of a can five or ten years old are as good and as much desired as five or ten days old, what harm can come to the packer in dating the can? Even if it is as good, has not the consumer or the purchaser of the can a right to know whether it is five days or fifty years old? If it is as good, why are the labels melted off, or washed off by hot water, and new labels put on, as stated by Mr. Wilson, who represented the packers, if it is not to make the purchaser believe that the contents were put in recently? This of itself is a fraud and is no valid reason why the date should not be put on. Everybody knows that everything decays, that food products decompose, and deteriorate, become stale, putrid, poison, and rotten in time, and it is only a question of time.

We know that a food product eaten under one condition may be healthful, while under another it is deadly; and it seems to me that the people are entitled to know. As has been stated here to-day, the spirit of all our pure-food laws is that no misbranding or deception is to be tolerated. It seems to me that we should legislate now so as to preserve the integrity of this article and protect its markets.

As has been referred to here to-day, millions of pounds of fresh meats are being sent abroad and accepted without any question being raised if inspected and passed by our Government; and it seems to me that the date of approval ought to go on all of these cans, so that the canned goods can be sold as well as the fresh meats. We know that canned meat eaten under one condition may be healthful and under another condition may be deadly. Then why not state the date of inspection upon the can? The answer is the beef trust objects. It insists that the deadly, poisonous, and spoiled meat, by reason of age, shall be sold as well as the wholesome, palatable, fresh, nutritious, and healthful. The contention is that as long as the can is in good condition, as long as the contents is kept from exposure to air, the product is kept from spoiling, but as soon as the can is opened, or holes rust through, the meat becomes unfit for food and injurious to health. Even if that statement were true, the statement is a confession that the contents of the can can not be kept in good condition for any number of years. Anyone who knows anything about the quality of tin manufactured and sold to-day knows that it is less resistant to rust, deterioration, and corrosion than tin made years ago. Anyone who has ever owned a tin pail, or a tin pan, or tinware of any kind, knows that it lasts only a few months and not for a number of years. Therefore their argument falls to the ground. It is all rot. It is as rotten as the contents of a five-year-old can.

But they say that this would be a hardship on the merchant. Oh, they would have us believe now that they have a deep-rooted interest in the welfare of the merchant; that it is for him they are fighting, for his interest and not their own. Gentlemen, think of the absurdity of this.

Notwithstanding the fact that inconsistencies have been defended and pictured as virtues, yet there are those who still believe "consistency, thou art a jewel." Evidently the trust believes in the recent teachings—or, in other words, it is for anything to get the "coon."

Think of their inconsistency. If the canned product is as good and desirable when five years as when five days old, what difference does it make to the merchant whether the date of inspection is on the can or not if it does not hurt the sale of the can? What should he care about the label? The trust knows, as everybody else does, that the date upon the can exposes the age and quality of its contents. It knows that very few, if any, will buy stale, spoiled, poisoned, or rotten meat—that is, if they know what they are buying—and that if these goods are to be sold at all it must be by deceiving the purchaser. It would then have you believe that the merchant is anxious to deceive—to sell his customer spoiled meat. Mr. Chairman, what an insult to our merchants. What merchant will resort to such a practice? Can anybody name a single merchant who would resort to such a dishonest method and hope to succeed in business? No; as a general thing successful merchants are honest. What a misconception it is on the part of some who believe and contend it is the dishonest man who succeeds in life, in private or public. A merchant known to be dishonest and crooked in his dealings is generally a merchant without business. On the other hand, let the merchant be known to be upright, fair, square, and just in all his dealings, and he will have the confidence and respect of all.

The motto of the successful merchant, or successful man, either in public or private life, is to part with anything and everything rather than with conscience and rectitude of purpose. He is dominated by the more noble and lofty ideals; he has a firm determination to do justice and right, shunning deceitful and cunning practices. His guiding star is integrity, justice, and a square deal; and what the merchant wants is straight, sound, honest goods, not shelf-worn, spoiled, or poison food products to sell to his customers. Let a merchant deceive his customers by selling one of these poisoned cans, and when the contents are eaten and a member of the family dies from eating it, as happens very frequently, can the merchant hope to hold his trade? No, he will lose not only his trade, but the confidence of his neighbors, if he is found out, and of course he will be found out. The neighbors will attend the funeral, the papers will give an account of the poisoning and death, and the innocent merchant will soon be without a business. The fact is, the merchant wants to know what he is buying and selling. He wants the best, the fresh, and the healthful product. He is not in the deceiving business; his reputation is at stake; his honor is at stake; his trade and his business are at stake. He knows what quality to buy, and buys only enough at a time to sell before it gets spoiled, and needs no warning or suggestions against overstocking, and is not concerned about the "bugaboo" that he might be caught with a few old cans. He wants goods that will sell—not kill. He does not believe in fostering trade by fraud, and he, too, believes that concealing the date of inspection or the age of the article is a fraud on the consumer, and believes, as do 99 per cent of the American people, that the date of inspection should be stamped on the can.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no question but that all are entitled to know the date when the Government inspection occurred, the date when the Government put a stamp of approval upon the article which is to go out in the whole world, carrying with it the official approval of the United States.

If in the opinion of any purchaser the food in the cans that have been put up from five to thirty years is just as good or better than it was when inspected and passed or canned, let them buy it and eat it. Nobody objects. But, as before stated, it is the spirit of all our pure-food laws that no misbranding or deception is to be tolerated; that everybody is entitled to know just what he is buying and eating. The war office of Great Britain takes the precaution to provide in the contracts for the purchase of food for the soldiers that the date shall be put upon the can. Is not the American soldier entitled to as much consideration and the same protection as is given the soldiers of Great Britain? Why feed the American soldier on spoiled and poisoned meat? Is that position defensible in logic or morals? No; they have a right to know. Have we forgotten the scandal and our experience in the purchase of meat for the Spanish-American war soldiers? Is that experience to be repeated? How long are the people to be denied this protection against deception and fraud which involves health and life? Mr. Chairman, I believe that the greatest diappointment the people have met with from Congress was when Congress failed to require the packers to stamp the date of inspection upon the cans of meat, so that the purchaser might know just what he was buying and paying for; that he might know whether he was buying sound, fresh, and healthful food, or stale, spoiled, poisonous, or rotten meat. As was stated, it was a legislative abortion to provide for meat inspection in order to protect the people from fraud and imposition and then leave out one of the most important elements—the label—thereby enabling the beef trust to deceive the consumer by selling him a product good or bad, healthy or deadly, poisonous or sound. Think of it! Congress weak enough to yield to such an outrage! Are we to repeat the error and such an injustice?

Mr. Chairman, as stated, I believe that the greatest disappointment that ever came to the American people, the greatest disappointment ever meted out by Congress, was when in this legislation, in its attempt to protect the consumer against fraud and deception, it left out this most essential element. As was stated, it was a legislative abortion to try to legislate against this fraud and deception and to leave out this element—the most important one—giving information that was needed.

We have heard much about these disappointments, and indeed the people have met with many disappointments. You remember that the people were here knocking at the door of Congress, praying and pleading with Congress to protect them against the counterfeit—oleomargarine. Later on they were knocking at the door of Congress, patiently waiting, pleading, and praying for Congress to enact some law in some way to regulate the transportation rates. They were here at the doors for a number of years patiently waiting and pleading for Congress to give sufficient appropriation that would enable the independent packers to continue their business, but in place of increasing appropriations Congress, in its wisdom, saw fit to reduce appropriations, thereby practically denying the independent packers and the people the protection and encouragement which they were entitled to just as much as the trusts. As you know, for years they were here urging Congress to make appropriations. Then came the appointment of the O'Neil-Reynolds Commission and its report; then the gold brick handed out by the committee; then the President's letter, and then the present law, but with a gold tooth in it, requiring a $3,000,000 filling every year, and, besides, denying the people this information—the dating of the can.

Let us consider the proposition on its merits. In this short time I have tried to point out some of its merits and why this should be done. If you will investigate, I believe you will find this legislation is highly important and justly required in order to protect the cattle raisers, the meat producers, our market at home and abroad, and to protect the consumers of canned meat food products against deception and fraud; to conserve the life and health of the sweet children, the infant, the invalids; and to maintain our dignity, integrity, and standing with the world. Gentlemen, we have heard much about this annual appropriation, aggregating upward of $1,000,000,000. It has been said that much of it is being absolutely wasted by reasons of unbusiness-like and unstatesman-like procedure by Congress and elsewhere. Yes; about the disregard for justice, and for the best interests of 80,000,000 intelligent, loyal, and patriotic people. We have heard much about the rules of this House. They have been denounced in the most bitter terms as degrading, infamous, humiliating, hideous, autocratic, oppressive, inconsistent——

Mr. BURLESON. And tyrannical.

Mr. HAUGEN. And, as the gentleman from Texas says, tyrannical. But I am not here to criticise the rules. I am not here to quarrel with anyone. I have met nothing but the kindest treatment at the hands of everybody. I am here to quarrel with no one, nor am I here to talk against the rules, nor am I here to question the judgment or motive of anyone in this House. I give everybody the credit of being as honest and sincere in their convictions as I am; but I say, much has been said about the rules. Others have denounced the rulings as illogical and unjust. We have heard much about the humiliating position these rules have put not only the Members in, but 80,000,000 of intelligent, independent, and liberty-loving people; of 390 Members surrendering their independence, right, and power, reducing themselves to mere recording secretaries. Much has also been said about committee appointments, criticising the method by which they are made.

Mr. Chairman, if all that has been said and done be true—robbing the people of their money and property by making unwise and unnecessary appropriations, humiliating and robbing them of their independence and right in this House or anywhere else, would be a great wrong; but to permit them being robbed of their health and life is also a great wrong and an unpardonable sin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that I have accurately caught the last expression of the gentleman. Does he think there is any sort of antagonism between the right of the House of Representatives to express itself by majority vote and the opportunity of the American people to be protected by the action of the House of Representatives?

Mr. HAUGEN. The rights of the people are certainly protected by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman believe with me, that if the House of Representatives had an opportunity to represent its will by a majority vote, the House of Representatives would, in that majority vote, represent the will and interests of the American people?

Mr. HAUGEN. The majority always rules, and rules in this House as everywhere else, or ought to——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the gentleman to assert that the majority does rule in this House?

Mr. HAUGEN. It certainly does. If the majority of the House surrenders its power it is to blame, and no one else is to blame except the majority, because it would be the error of the majority.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With that I perfectly agree.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am not here to criticise the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And upon that question solely I am criticising the majority of the House.

There is no doubt about the fact that if the majority of the House consents to surrender its power, the majority of the House is responsible, and there is no doubt about the further proposition that when a majority of the House representing a party consents to surrender its power, that party is responsible.

Mr. HAUGEN. I see no reason for criticising the present House any more than the Democratic House. We have practically the same rules as we had under Democratic administration. A great many suggestions have been made, and it is possible that the rules can be improved upon. I am not here to criticise the rules. I could offer amendments to them which I would like to see adopted, and which I think might improve those rules, but I am not sure but that the present rules are just as good as they could possibly be made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is right about that. Now, let me ask the gentleman a question. When at the beginning of this Congress and at the beginning of the last Congress and at the beginning of the Congress before that the Committee on Rules reported the body of the rules, together with the resolution forbidding all amendment, did or did not the gentleman vote for the resolution?

Mr. HAUGEN. I certainly did. I certainly voted with the majority.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, did or did not the gentleman cut himself off from the right to do just what he now says ought to be done, to wit, to amend the rules in some particular.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have never been deprived of a single privilege or right in this House, and until I am, I have no reason to find any fault with the rules, and as I say, it is possible that these rules could be improved upon, but I am not here discussing this proposition. I simply want to make myself clear, that I have no quarrel with anyone, nor have I any questions to raise as to the present rules at this time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have occupied as much time as I care to, except to say, Let us consider this proposition on its merits. I have tried to point out some of its merits and why this legislation should be passed. I believe that it is important; I believe that if you will investigate you will find that it is important in order to maintain our markets at home and abroad. It is necessary in order to conserve the health and life of human beings, of children, infants, and invalids, not only in America, but in all parts of this world wherever these products are sold. I believe that we should now legislate so as to maintain the integrity of this article. What can be said against it? The only thing that I know of is that the all-powerful and greedy trust is against it and there is danger that on the morning after next election, should you support this amendment, you may find your political carcass outside of the breastworks, if this trust has the power and influence to put it there. But if you see this as I do I believe you will place the life and health of human beings above the glory of holding office. That distinguished, eloquent, and patriotic statesman, Patrick Henry, said:

> Is life so sweet, is peace so dear as to be purchased by bondage and slavery? Oh, God Almighty, forbid it! I know not what course you may take, but for me, give me liberty or give me death.

I would paraphrase that and say, "Is the glory of holding office so sweet as to be purchased by the life and health of not only the American people, but the people in every land where this product is sold? I do not know what course you will take, but for me, give protection to life and health, even at the expense of political life." [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, during the Fifty-ninth Congress I was a member of the Agricultural Committee. I was placed there upon the recommendation of the minority leader, the Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, upon the written request and indorsement of 101 Democratic Members out of a total Democratic membership of 137 in that Congress. During my service upon that committee I discharged every duty devolving upon me with the utmost fidelity and in accordance with the conscientious convictions of my own heart. During that service I came in direct conflict with the seed trust, which sought to have the provision making appropriation for the seed stricken from the bill. It was stricken out in the committee, but was restored in the House upon an amendment offered by me. But for the adoption of my amendment, or one like it, no farmer in this whole country would have received a package of seed from his Member of Congress or Senator, and no lady in this broad land would have received a package of flower seed. While a member of the committee I also helped frame the meat-inspection law, which requires the beef trust to furnish the people pure and wholesome meats.

I insisted that the bill be specific and effective. There were some provisions which Mr. LAMB of Virginia and Mr. Bowie of Alabama and I thought ought to go into the bill to make it the more effective, but which were left out of the bill when reported from the committee. We therefore made a minority report, and two out of the three provisions we contended for were adopted by the House. I also favored appropriations, within constitutional limitations, for good roads. Since I have been in Congress I have done all I could in the interest of rural mail delivery and all the mail facilities for the people. In other words, without going further into details, as a member of the committee and as a Member of Congress I have favored such measures as I honestly believed would be most helpful to the farmers of this country, believing as I do, that when you contribute to the prosperity of the farmers you at the same time help every other vocation, trade, calling, profession, and interest in the land. [Applause.] At the beginning of this session of Congress the Speaker, in the exercise of the power conferred upon him by the rules of this Republican House, removed me from the Agricultural Committee and assigned me to other committees, although I was again recommended for membership upon the Agricultural Committee by the minority leader [Mr. WILLIAMS], and although Mr. WILLIAMS vigorously protested against my removal and although I am assured my continuance upon the committee met the unanimous approval of all the Democratic Members.

My removal from the committee, however, has not diminished my interest in the agricultural people nor cooled my ardor to labor for their welfare. The Speaker had the power to take me off the committee, but, thank God, he has not the power to prevent me from being heard upon this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The only power which could thus close the door of opportunity to me is that exercised by the patriotic, chivalrous, noble, and loyal Mississippians who live in my district; and until they demand my retirement I shall continue to work earnestly and faithfully for them and to speak out boldly for their interests and the interests of the people of my beloved country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am a candidate for reelection, and to my people I shall appeal for their indorsement and a vindication of my record at the ballot box, and I have no doubt as to what the result will be. [Applause.]

I have examined the bill that is now pending before the House and which is under consideration. The appropriations in it are somewhat larger than the bills which have preceded it, and in the main I find that its provisions are wholesome and good, and I am glad that it has the unanimous indorsement of every member of the committee and that there will therefore probably be no serious controversy in reference to its adoption by the House.

While the appropriations provided in this bill are somewhat larger than the appropriations in bills which have preceded it, still I must say that I do not believe that they are as large as they might have been in the interests of the people of the country and for the development of the agricultural welfare of this great land. I can not well conceive of how money could be better expended than by using it for the purpose of developing the agricultural interests and for the purpose of lending a helping hand to those who by their toil and in the sweat of their face not only earn their own living, but take care of the welfare and the prosperity of the country which we all love. I have taken occasion to inquire into and investigate the appropriations made for the various other Departments of this Government, and I have not taken mere hearsay in reference to what they were, but I have asked for official statements from the Cabinet officers of the various Departments and have obtained them in that way, showing the appropriations made for the various Departments during the last ten years. I want to call attention to these appropriations and contrast them, at least to some extent, with the appropriations which have been made for the Agricultural Department, the benefits from which were so beautifully and eloquently described by the distinguished chairman of the committee to-day in his closing remarks.

I find, upon investigation, that the appropriations for the Interior Department from 1898 to 1907, inclusive, amount to the enormous sum of $1,641,767,440.57; for the War Department, $1,582,638,679.47; for the Post-Office Department, $1,473,402,938; for the Navy Department, $876,411,705.35; for the Treasury Department, $443,153,997.52; for the Department of Justice, $82,270,200.31; for the Agricultural Department, $50,257,730.46; for the Department of Commerce and Labor in the five years that it has been in existence, $46,581,074.99; for the State Department in ten years, $19,840,267.89. The average appropriation for each one of these Departments per year for the last ten years is as follows: Interior Department, $164,176,744.05; War Department, $158,263,867.94; Post-Office Department, $147,340,293.80; Navy Department, $87,641,170.53; Treasury Department, $44,315,399.75; Department of Justice, $8,227,020.03; Agricultural Department, $5,025,773.04; Department of Commerce and Labor, $9,316,214.99; State Department, $1,984,026.78.

From these figures we find that this Government has expended for the War and Navy Departments combined for the past ten years, from 1898 to 1907, inclusive, the enormous and almost inconceivable sum of $2,459,050,384.82. The average annual appropriation for the War Department and Navy Department combined is $245,905,038.48, forty-nine times as much as the amount appropriated for the Agricultural Department for the same length of time. It seems to me that we are spending more money for brass buttons and for battle ships and for show than there is any necessity for spending, and neglecting our internal improvements in this country, and neglecting the development of the agricultural interests of the country, while taxing the people with enormous taxation to sustain this marvelous expenditure and not giving them back "a square deal" nor due return for the money which they are required to pay. It seems to me that we should cease exhibiting our seemingly warlike tendencies at such enormous expense and make more liberal appropriations to the peaceful pursuits of our people and seek the fulfillment of the prophecy of Isaiah recorded in the blessed book of God's eternal truth in the second chapter of Isaiah and fourth verse, as follows:

> And He shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

Let us teach that this is a time of peace and not a time of war and that the greatest prosperity, the greatest happiness that can be brought to the people of the land is to give them peace, furnish them comfort, secure them prosperity, and let them enjoy the good things they produce by honest toil and patriotic service to our great country. [Applause.]

The first appropriation for agriculture was made in 1839, and the amount appropriated was the paltry sum of $1,000. The total appropriations for the Agricultural Department for the sixty-nine years up to date amount to only $84,328,920.09, and the annual appropriation for the Agricultural Department since its organization to now has been the small and pitiful sum, in comparison with the enormous amounts which I have mentioned, of but $1,240,131.17. The above shows what Congress is doing for agriculture. What has agriculture done for the country?

May we take a few simple illustrations and incidents in order that we may see what it is doing for the country and for the welfare of the people? Take, for instance, durum wheat. In 1899 the Department of Agriculture spent $10,000 to import durum wheat seed from Russia and Africa. That crop last year was worth $30,000,000 to this country. That crop alone is worth six times the average yearly appropriation for the whole Agricultural Department.

Take cotton, the great product of the South, and what do we find it has accomplished for the people? Last year the valuation of the cotton crop was $675,000,000; and we exported $482,000,000 worth of cotton, that brought that much gold to the United States of America. Oh, how glad were the hearts of the people made throughout this country whenever the telegrams would go flashing over the wires and be published in the public print during this panic which has been pending and which is still going on, that some vessel from across the ocean was bringing millions of gold back to this country.

Do you know what was bringing it back? It was not our tariff laws. It was not the laws upon the statute books. It was the product of the farmers of the Southland who were sending their cotton to the foreign countries and in return bringing back the gold to replenish our coffers and to relieve the money situation among our people. It is not your law upon the statute books that maintains your gold standard. It is the cotton of the South, which is the great leveler between this and foreign countries, that is bringing the gold to this country and bringing, or contributing at least to bring, the balance of trade to our shores.

Take another instance, namely, that of tobacco. In the years 1901 to 1906, inclusive, there was paid into the United States Treasury as internal taxes on tobacco alone the sum of $296,669,359.19, an average of $49,444,893.13 per year. The total appropriations for the Agricultural Department for the same six years amounted to only $32,573,770. The tax paid on tobacco, one agricultural product, for one year alone would practically pay all the expenses of the whole Agricultural Department for the past ten years, and the amount paid for six years is more than three times as much as the total appropriations for the whole Department of Agriculture for the sixty-nine years of its existence.

If you would appropriate the money arising from this one agricultural product, we could take care of the whole Agricultural Department and furnish it with a great deal more money than it has ever had or ever received from the National Government otherwise, and help the farmers all over the country with bountiful hand.

What further do we find? By reference to Secretary Wilson's report, on page 18, we find these marvelous figures: The grand total of the farm products of this country for 1907 is $7,412,000,000. This is $657,000,000 above the value of 1906, $1,103,000,000 above that of 1905, $1,253,000,000 above that of 1904, $1,495,000,000 above that of 1903, and $2,695,000,000 above the census amount for 1899. The value of the farm products of 1907 was 10 per cent greater than that of 1906, 17 per cent over 1905, 20 per cent greater than 1904, 25 per cent over 1903, and 57 per cent over 1899.

I said a moment ago that the agricultural products brought the balance of trade to our shores, and here are the official figures in reference to that, to which I call your attention.

The Secretary says:

> The farmer is concerned in the nation's balance of international trade. * * * In eighteen years, beginning in 1890, the farmers have not failed to secure a balance of at least $193,000,000, the low amount of 1895. The great aggregate of the eighteen balances in the trade in farm products is $6,500,000,000, while the trade in other commodities during the eighteen years resulted in a grand adverse balance of $456,000,000.

In other words, but for the farmers of this country the balance of trade, taking into consideration all the other exports of every kind in this country of every kind and description, would have been against the United States to the amount of $456,000,000, but taking into consideration the export of farm products in connection with all the other exports of the country, it cancels the $456,000,000 and leaves a balance in favor of the United States of $6,500,000,000.

In view of these remarkable results, I want to ask you if you believe the farmers of this country are getting "a square deal?" Why not make liberal appropriations for them? I favored liberal appropriations for the Department and for the betterment of agriculture while I was a member of the committee, and I shall continue to favor liberal appropriations—not extravagant appropriations, not useless appropriations, but appropriations that I believe are for the welfare of the country.

Why not make fair, reasonable, and liberal appropriations, when we find that to-day there is an available cash balance in the Treasury of $263,589,960.05? Why let it lie in the Treasury of the United States, accomplishing no good purpose, when we can make appropriations that would benefit the people and spend some of this money among those who help to produce it, and in this way restore confidence and the prosperity which we so much need to-day?

The truth of it is I do not believe the farmers are getting "a square deal." They are entitled to greater consideration at the hands of Congress than they are receiving. Why do you, like the taskmasters of Egypt, lay burdens upon them grievous to be borne and do so little for them? Why not do something for them that would go directly to their welfare and for their benefit?

I have introduced during this session of Congress a bill for the relief of the farmers of the United States. It is a bill to repeal the tariff duty, and place upon the free list agricultural implements, wagons, farm tools, axes, nails, horseshoes, harness, cotton gins, bagging, and ties, and various other articles in every-day use on every farm throughout this broad land. The passage of this bill would save the farmers millions of dollars and leave the money in their pockets.

Why are you not willing to report that bill? Why will you not at least report something in that direction? Why do you "stand pat" and refuse all revision of the tariff and give no relief of any kind whatever? Why do you not take some action to give some relief from the panic from which we are suffering? When this Congress met last December the first committee appointed by the Speaker was the Committee on Banking and Currency. It was appointed before the Committee on Rules, before the Committee on Appropriations, before the Committee on Ways and Means, or any other committee, but still to-day we have no results. We hear no sound upon the floor of the House looking toward relief from present conditions.

You said if the people would give the Republican party absolute control of the country in every branch of the Government and a high protective tariff that would be security against panic. You said, further, if the gold standard was adopted that would absolutely secure against panic.

But you are now in control of every branch of the Government. You have the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the President, and you have the highest tariff ever known in this country, and the gold standard, and with all these combined you did not prevent panic. The people trusted you and you have deceived them. It is your panic and you are responsible for it. Why don't you do something to relieve it?

I introduced a bill on the currency question. I have not time to discuss it or go into details with reference to it, but if you would report and pass my bill much good would result from its enactment. Not only that bill, but no other bill has up to this hour been considered. Why not do something to help the country, and why not do something to relieve present conditions? You have "stood pat" until you are the "obstructionists," and you can no longer lay that at our door. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JOHN M. NELSON, of Wisconsin, asked you some very pertinent questions a few days ago, and I desire to repeat some of them—

> Why not revise the tariff to the extent, at least, of removing the protection now afforded to some of the notorious trusts and combinations of the country? Why not consider an income tax to adjust the burdens of taxation among the people? Why not consider an inheritance tax, so as to return a part of the "swollen fortunes" of the "predatory classes" to the people, from whom these fortunes were unrighteously taken? Why not consider amendments to the antitrust laws, in order to strengthen the Department of Justice in the prosecution of some of these gigantic combinations that oppress the people? Why not empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix a valuation of the railways of the country, in order to "squeeze out the water" and ascertain a fair basis of rate making? Why not consider measures for the suppression of gambling in stock and dealing in futures, practices that depress prices on the products of the people at times so disastrously?

Mr. LEVER. To what party does Mr. Nelson belong?

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman belongs to the Republican party, but he asked some splendid questions, showing that a gentleman can not always be judged by the company he keeps. Good things sometimes come out of Nazareth. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I introduced a bill to prevent stock gambling and gambling in futures. That bill sleeps in the committee room. Why don't you report and pass it? Why don't you relieve the press of the country of the terrible tribute they are paying the paper trust by putting wood pulp on the free list? Are you surprised there are demands coming from all over this country for relief from these conditions, for relief from exorbitant taxation, for relief from the gambling spirit that runs riot in the land? Why don't you report and pass some bill restricting immigration, and stop the scum of Europe from coming here? For God's sake, do something for the people or get out of the way and let us do something. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am not surprised, therefore, in view of this situation, that the minority leader [Mr. WILLIAMS] to-day read the "riot act" to you and served notice on you that something must be done by the party in power, or he would resort to every parliamentary means possible to enforce action of some kind. What are you going to do about it? I present these issues to you and to the country, and if you do not act the people can and will make you act or hurl you from power. [Applause.] The bill now pending before the House ought to receive the careful consideration of every Member by reason of the vast interest with which it deals and its purposes to elevate and dignify the great and basic pursuit of American citizens.

The countless millions of our population are fed and clothed by the American farmer. The grain waving in golden beauty upon the great plains of the West, the cotton drifting like summer snow upon the fields of the South, freight the fleets of nations and loose their sails, thread the continents with tracks of steel, fill the earth with the roar of trains, and heap for trade and commerce and useful art those stores that make a nation great. Where are the sinews of our strength, if they are not found in our great, diversified agricultural products? What victorious hosts ever waved as joyous banners as those that float above the tasseled maize from the snows of Maine to the spicy groves of California? What spirit of beauty hovers above Southern fields when fleecy bolls uncover to crown "King Cotton!" [Applause.]

What a marvelous power, that has defied for all these years grievous political wrong more destructive than pestilence and more cruel than war! What a marvelous people, that have borne without revolt assaults upon their interest by legislative bodies and a merciless war by monopolies upon their great pursuit! What other people in your midst can you rely upon so implicitly in peace or in war? Who filled the great armies in that immortal struggle of the blue and gray and baptized American valor anew in an ever widening and brightening fame? [Applause.]

There are sylvan retreats all over this land, sequestered nooks rich in idyllic charm, sacred forever more to warrior spirits who left these quiet scenes at their country's call to return no more, unknown and yet immortal. In obedience to that pure and holy patriotism their survivors, without regard to geographic division, have waited for a proper recognition of the great agricultural interests, not alone upon capital that has sought and justified every pretext for their robbery and spoliation, not alone upon trusts and combines more hurtful than floods and frosts, but upon the American Congress they have waited in the vain hope that their numbers, their wealth, their intelligence, and, more than all, their devotion and importance would secure for them just legislation.

While they have waited they have witnessed many novel occurrences. They have seen a money panic in times of plenty, manufacturers arrayed against them, common carriers levying their freights to their manifest injury, Standard Oil companies waxing mighty upon their substances, gamblers in futures gloating upon their productions, everywhere hostile organizations, everywhere lurking assassins; yea, even the very arches of her temple have rung to the footfalls of treason when agricultural statistics were juggled in the interest of monopoly.

But despite these hostile surroundings, despite storm and flood and drought, they annually add billions of wealth to the American people. They annually feed and clothe our vast population. They annually export to other countries such a vast surplus of food and raw material that the tax even upon the importations paid for by these agricultural products is sufficient to pay the vast expenses of the Government and, under existing laws, to fill the Treasury with dead and useless capital. They light the fires in every forge; turn the countless wheels of industry everywhere; gird continents with glittering threads of steel and hurrying steeds of fire; white the seas with the sails of commerce; pour upon all lands and all peoples and every human pursuit the fatness which their toil has wrought from the earth. [Applause.]

But light is breaking upon their long night. They, too, are combining for their protection; this great host who have in their keeping every political possibility of this Government are organizing. The accursed policy of producing panics can not always fetter them; the cry of overproduction can no longer deceive them; inferior consideration by the Government can no longer satisfy them. They ask, and they intend to have, just and fair legislation, because their pursuit is the basis upon which the general welfare rests. Who shall oppose them in their righteous demand? Who shall stay them when they summon their clans? Can you fetter the ocean? Can you arrest an avalanche?

Can you deny justice to millions of your long-suffering and confiding countrymen? Shall the policy of building up one pursuit at the expense of another be eternally continued? Or shall our policy be, like the sun in his beneficent journey as he lights the summit and the valley, to favor honest toil and industry everywhere, until the cry of classism shall cease from the land, until self-reliance and sturdy independence shall regain their power, and the American people, with deserved trust in their officers and Representatives, shall satisfy the world that this great country, under the guidance of God and the ægis of liberty, belongs to no class or set of people, but to the whole people, who are accomplishing with brain and brawn and great forbearance the marvelous destiny of freedom's great empire? [Great applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have these reports, letters, and statements from the various Departments of the Government, which are official, showing the figures that I have used in the remarks that I have just made. I should like to have unanimous consent to print them as an appendix to my remarks, without any additions to them or taking anything from them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 28, 1908.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER, Jr.,
House of Representatives, United States.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of the 24th instant, I submit herewith a statement showing the amounts appropriated for the Department of the Interior, its bureaus, offices, etc., under six general divisions, namely: "Salaries and expenses; salaries and contingent expenses, public land offices; Indian affairs; pensions; public works; miscellaneous," for the period of ten years, commencing July 1, 1898, and ending June 30, 1907.

This statement also shows the proportionate increase and decrease in the appropriations made in each year within that period of time.

As you are probably aware, the above six general divisions of appropriations are further subdivided into individual detailed appropriations, under 600 or more heads.

While it is not practicable at this time to prepare a statement showing the exact amounts expended from these many individual appropriations, it can probably be asserted, with a reasonable degree of correctness, that the amounts appropriated within this period of time have been practically expended, and the surplus, if any, from these individual appropriations, covered into the United States Treasury, is of no considerable amount.

Very respectfully, JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD, Secretary.

Very respectfully, V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

Balance on hand June 30, 1907	43,657,964.23
Turned into the surplus fund		42,591,364.64
Total	849,277,181.56	833,820,340.71

The excess of payments over amounts appropriated, less amount turned in to the surplus fund ($15,456,840.85), is due to payments from funds not appropriated for by Congress, such as the clothing and small stores fund, Naval Hospital fund, naval supply fund, pay of the Navy deposit fund, and ordnance material proceeds of sales, which are included in the first column.

The large amounts turned into the surplus fund during the years 1900 to 1904, inclusive, are mostly the unexpended balances of the emergency fund and other special appropriations incidental to the Spanish war.

E. B. ROGERS,
Paymaster-General, United States Navy.

To the Representatives and Senators in Congress:

We, the undersigned, members of faculties in universities and colleges, and educators of New York City, voicing, as we believe, the sentiments of many thousands of American citizens, earnestly protest against the extravagant demand for an addition of over $60,000,000 in the form of four new battle ships, cruisers, etc., to the naval budget of last year, inasmuch as no danger threatens the country not known last April, when President Roosevelt told the world: "We are no longer enlarging our Navy. We are simply keeping up its strength. The addition of one battle ship a year barely enables us to make good the units which become obsolete."

Sixty-five per cent of the national income is now expended on war, past and present. The increase of our naval budget has recently been used in the French Assembly as a reason for increasing its own; is largely responsible for the increase of armaments among Asiatic nations, and is well-nigh certain to retard that reduction in the armaments of the world for which we have so long been waiting.

The growing discontent throughout the world at the appalling increase of waste of national resources must be heeded. We feel that this protest is the more necessary, inasmuch as there are various new and effective methods now available for promoting international friendship and rationally settling difficulties which these new demands seem to ignore.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a personal statement, which will only take a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to make a personal statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that the gentleman's request does not require unanimous consent. I do not think it does; but if it does require unanimous consent, I am forced to object.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, suppose the gentleman gives us an idea of what he wants to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can submit to the Speaker the nature of his proposition. If it requires unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can state the nature of his proposition if he rises to a question of personal privilege or a privileged question. If he does not——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter of personal privilege, but it is so unimportant that I hardly wish to take the attention of the House to this extent. On yesterday, after the first roll call, I paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE]. When the point of no quorum was made and there was a call of the House I voted. I should instead have answered "present." I have explained the matter to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE], and he does not care about it. I think, however, when one makes such a mistake, mention of it should be made in the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is clearly a matter of personal privilege, I think.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not agree with the gentleman; but the gentleman could ask unanimous consent, if he desired so to do, that the Journal be corrected in the way indicated by him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to object.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the communication from the chief justice of the Court of Claims of March 16, 1908, and also the communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims of March 11, 1908, reported the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That in compliance with the request of the chief justice of the Court of Claims, the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to return to the Court of Claims the following Congressional cases, namely, of James Bigler v. The United States, No. 11801, and of Ellen L. Faunce, widow of Peter Faunce, deceased, v. The United States, No. 10942, C and F 82, and the said court is hereby authorized to proceed in said cases and in each thereof as if no return therein had been made to the Senate.

ROOM FOR JOINT COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] on the 4th instant, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Joint Committee on Revision of the Laws be authorized to rent a room in the Bliss Building for the use of the employees of said committee from February 1, 1908, at a monthly rental not to exceed $25.

The amendment was, in line 3, after the word "use," to strike out the words "of the employees," so as to read, "for the use of said committee," etc.

Mr. CULBERSON. How long is it proposed to permit the renting of the building?

Mr. KEAN. There is a letter accompanying the resolution from the chairman of the Committee on Rules, asking that this be done. The chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws can tell the Senator how long he expects to occupy the room.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no limitation at all as to time in the resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. The limitation would be determined by the arrangements that the Senate should make for the accommodation of its committees upon whom it imposes duties.

The committee has been shifted around several times, borrowing rooms in which to work. I have been paying the rent of this room personally for some time because it was necessary to have some place for men to work. They are engaged in the absolutely necessary performance of duty connected with the revision of the laws, and if the Committee on Revision of the Laws is to be retained and they are to perform this work, they certainly must have a room in which to perform it.

I applied for quarters for the committee in the Capitol building during the early part of the session. It was not found possible to give the committee a room in this building. They were in the Annex, in borrowed rooms, until other committees claiming prior rights to the rooms made it necessary to remove them. I then went to the Bliss Building, that being the most convenient building to get in which rooms could be procured, and rented a room for them. They are there at work now.

Mr. CULBERSON. I made no objection to the resolution. I simply inquired for what length of time the rent is to continue. My understanding was that the resolution is to provide room for a clerk and assistants for a special committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. For the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood that that committee had already made its report.

Mr. HEYBURN. That committee has reported the Criminal Code. It has prepared for consideration the judiciary title of the Revised Statutes. It has ready for consideration at any time that Congress is ready to take it up thirteen titles of the Revised Statutes.

The men who are engaged in working in this room are now arranging the existing laws opposite the work of the Commission on Revision, which was reported to Congress a year ago last December. It is a very extensive work. I would say that if we are to carry out and complete the work for which the committee was appointed it will take a year.

Mr. CULBERSON. Why not fix that limitation in the resolution?

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course if at the end of that time the work is not completed, we shall have to make further arrangements for using the room.

Mr. FRYE. We shall have the building over here by that time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope so. I think it is high time that Congress made some arrangement for adequate quarters for those who are performing necessary duties in connection with its work.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to make simply one statement. I think by the beginning of the next session the building called the Senate Office Building will be ready for occupation.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is absolutely certain.

Mr. CULLOM. It is absolutely certain unless something very unusual transpires.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the chairman of the committee, who I understand is willing to consent to an amendment, to limit the occupation of the room for a year.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to that amendment, but I will say to the Senator from Texas that all these appropriations are absolutely in the control of the Senate. They can be revoked at any time.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; but the Senate will never hear of this again, I think, after it is passed.

Mr. CULLOM. There is no occasion for the time to run longer than the beginning of the next session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out the words "of the employees."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Does the Senator from Texas desire to have an amendment limiting the time to one year?

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that amendment.

Mr. KEAN. Let the resolution be made to read, "to rent for not exceeding one year from the 1st day of February, 1908."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add in the second line of the resolution, after the word "rent," the words "for not exceeding one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SPECIAL MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I call your attention to certain measures as to which I think there should be action by the Congress before the close of the present session. There is ample time for their consideration. As regards most if not all of the matters, bills have been introduced into one or the other of the two Houses, and it is not too much to hope that action will be taken one way or the other on these bills at the present session. In my message at the opening of the present session, and, indeed, in various messages to previous Congresses, I have repeatedly suggested action on most of these measures.

Child labor should be prohibited throughout the nation. At least a model child-labor bill should be passed for the District of Columbia. It is unfortunate that in the one place solely dependent upon Congress for its legislation there should be no law whatever to protect children by forbidding or regulating their labor.

I renew my recommendation for the immediate reenactment of an employers' liability law, drawn to conform to the recent decision of the Supreme Court. Within the limits indicated by the court, the law should be made thorough and comprehensive, and the protection it affords should embrace every class of employee to which the power of the Congress can extend.

In addition to a liability law protecting the employees of common carriers, the Government should show its good faith by enacting a further law giving compensation to its own employees for injury or death incurred in its service. It is a reproach to us as a nation that in both Federal and State legislation we have afforded less protection to public and private employees than any other industrial country of the world.

I also urge that action be taken along the line of the recommendations I have already made concerning injunctions in labor disputes. No temporary restraining order should be issued by any court without notice; and the petition for a permanent injunction upon which such temporary restraining order has been issued should be heard by the court issuing the same within a reasonable time—say, not to exceed a week or thereabouts from the date when the order was issued. It is worth considering whether it would not give greater popular confidence in the impartiality of sentences for contempt if it was required that the issue should be decided by another judge than the one issuing the injunction, except where the contempt is committed in the presence of the court, or in other case of urgency.

I again call attention to the urgent need of amending the interstate-commerce law, and especially the antitrust law, along the lines indicated in my last message. The interstate-commerce law should be amended so as to give railroads the right to make traffic agreements, subject to these agreements being approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and published in all of their details. The Commission should also be given the power to make public and to pass upon the issuance of all securities hereafter issued by railroads doing an interstate-commerce business.

A law should be passed providing in effect that when a Federal court determines to place a common carrier or other public utility concern under the control of a receivership, the Attorney-General should have the right to nominate at least one of the receivers; or else in some other way the interests of the stockholders should be consulted, so that the management may not be wholly redelivered to the man or men the failure of whose policy may have necessitated the creation of the receivership. Receiverships should be used, not to operate roads, but as speedily as possible to pay their debts and return them to the proper owners.

In addition to the reasons I have already urged on your attention, it has now become important that there should be an amendment of the antitrust law, because of the uncertainty as to how this law affects combinations among labor men and farmers, if the combination has any tendency to restrict interstate commerce. All of these combinations, if and while existing for and engaged in the promotion of innocent and proper purposes, should be recognized as legal. As I have repeatedly pointed out, this antitrust law was a most unwisely drawn statute. It was perhaps inevitable that in feeling after the right remedy the first attempts to provide such should be crude; and it was absolutely imperative that some legislation should be passed to control, in the interest of the public, the business use of the enormous aggregations of corporate wealth that are so marked a feature of the modern industrial world. But the present antitrust law, in its construction and working, has exemplified only too well the kind of legislation which, under the guise of being thoroughgoing, is drawn up in such sweeping form as to become either ineffective or else mischievous.

In the modern industrial world combinations are absolutely necessary; they are necessary among business men, they are necessary among laboring men, they are becoming more and more necessary among farmers. Some of these combinations are among the most powerful of all instruments for wrongdoing. Others offer the only effective way of meeting actual business needs. It is mischievous and unwholesome to keep upon the statute books unmodified a law, like the antitrust law, which, while in practice only partially effective against vicious combinations, has nevertheless in theory been construed so as sweepingly to prohibit every combination for the transaction of modern business. Some real good has resulted from this law. But the time has come when it is imperative to modify it. Such modification is urgently needed for the sake of the business men of the country, for the sake of the wageworkers, and for the sake of the farmers. The Congress can not afford to leave it on the statute books in its present shape.

It has now become uncertain how far this law may involve all labor organizations and farmers' organizations, as well as all business organizations, in conflict with the law; or, if we secure literal compliance with the law, how far it may result in the destruction of the organizations necessary for the transaction of modern business, as well as of all labor organizations and farmers' organizations, completely check the wise movement for securing business cooperation among farmers, and put back half a century the progress of the movement for the betterment of labor. A bill has been presented in the Congress to remedy this situation. Some such measure as this bill is needed in the interest of all engaged in the industries which are essential to the country's well-being. I do not pretend to say the exact shape that the bill should take, and the suggestions I have to offer are tentative; and my views would apply equally to any other measure which would achieve the desired end. Bearing this in mind, I would suggest, merely tentatively, the following changes in the law:

The substantive part of the antitrust law should remain as at present; that is, every contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations should continue to be declared illegal; provided, however, that some proper governmental authority (such as the Commissioner of Corporations acting under the Secretary of Commerce and Labor) be allowed to pass on any such contracts. Probably the best method of providing for this would be to enact that any contract, subject to the prohibition contained in the antitrust law, into which it was desired to enter, might be filed with the Bureau of Corporations or other appropriate executive body. This would provide publicity. Within, say, sixty days of the filing—which period could be extended by order of the Department whenever for any reason it did not give the Department sufficient time for a thorough examination—the executive department having power might forbid the contract, which would then become subject to the provisions of the antitrust law, if at all in restraint of trade.

If no such prohibition was issued, the contract would then only be liable to attack on the ground that it constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade. Whenever the period of filing had passed without any such prohibition, the contracts or combinations could be disapproved or forbidden only after notice and hearing with a reasonable provision for summary review on appeal by the courts. Labor organizations, farmers' organizations, and other organizations not organized for purposes of profit, should be allowed to register under the law by giving the location of the head office, the charter and by-laws, and the names and addresses of their principal officers. In the interest of all these organizations—business, labor, and farmers' organizations alike—the present provision permitting the recovery of threefold damages should be abolished, and as a substitute therefor the right of recovery allowed for should be only the damages sustained by the plaintiff and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

The law should not affect pending suits; a short statute of limitations should be provided, so far as the past is concerned, not to exceed a year. Moreover, and even more in the interest of labor than of business combinations, all such suits brought for causes of action heretofore occurred should be brought only if the contract or combination complained of was unfair or unreasonable. It may be well to remember that all of the suits hitherto brought by the Government under the antitrust law have been in cases where the combination or contract was in fact unfair, unreasonable, and against the public interest.

It is important that we should encourage trade agreements between employer and employee where they are just and fair. A strike is a clumsy weapon for righting wrongs done to labor, and we should extend, so far as possible, the process of conciliation and arbitration as a substitute for strikes. Moreover, violence, disorder, and coercion, when committed in connection with strikes, should be as promptly and as sternly repressed as when committed in any other connection. But strikes themselves are, and should be, recognized to be entirely legal. Combinations of workingmen have a peculiar reason for their existence. The very wealthy individual employer, and still more the very wealthy corporation, stand at an enormous advantage when compared to the individual workingman; and while there are many cases where it may not be necessary for laborers to form a union, in many other cases it is indispensable, for otherwise the thousands of small units, the thousands of individual workingmen, will be left helpless in their dealings with the one big unit, the big individual or corporate employer.

Twenty-two years ago, by the act of June 29, 1886, trades unions were recognized by law, and the right of laboring people to combine for all lawful purposes was formally recognized, this right including combination for mutual protection and benefits, the regulation of wages, hours, and conditions of labor, and the protection of the individual rights of the workmen in the prosecution of their trade or trades; and in the act of June 1, 1898, strikes were recognized as legal in the same provision that forbade participation in or instigation of force or violence against persons or property, or the attempt to prevent others from working, by violence, threat, or intimidation. The business man must be protected in person and property, and so must the farmer and the wageworker; and as regards all alike, the right of peaceful combination for all lawful purposes should be explicitly recognized.

The right of employers to combine and contract with one another and with their employees should be explicitly recognized; and so should the right of the employees to combine and to contract with one another and with the employers, and to seek peaceably to persuade others to accept their views, and to strike for the purpose of peaceably obtaining from employers satisfactory terms for their labor. Nothing should be done to legalize either a blacklist or a boycott that would be illegal at common law; this being the type of boycott defined and condemned by the Anthracite Strike Commission.

The question of financial legislation is now receiving such attention in both Houses that we have a right to expect action before the close of the session. It is urgently necessary that there should be such action. Moreover, action should be taken to establish postal savings banks. These postal savings banks are imperatively needed for the benefit of the wageworkers and men of small means, and will be a valuable adjunct to our whole financial system.

The time has come when we should prepare for a revision of the tariff. This should be, and indeed must be, preceded by careful investigation. It is peculiarly the province of the Congress and not of the President, and indeed peculiarly the province of the House of Representatives, to originate a tariff bill and to determine upon its terms; and this I fully realize. Yet it seems to me that before the close of this session provision should be made for collecting full material which will enable the Congress elected next fall to act immediately after it comes into existence. This would necessitate some action by the Congress at its present session, perhaps in the shape of directing the proper committee to gather the necessary information, both through the committee itself and through Government agents, who should report to the committee and should lay before it the facts which would permit it to act with prompt and intelligent fairness. These Government agents, if it is not deemed wise to appoint individuals from outside the public service, might with advantage be members of the Executive Departments, designated by the President, on his own motion or on the request of the committee, to act with it.

I am of the opinion, however, that one change in the tariff could with advantage be made forthwith. Our forests need every protection, and one method of protecting them would be to put upon the free list wood pulp, with a corresponding reduction upon paper made from wood pulp, when they come from any country that does not put an export duty upon them.

Ample provision should be made for a permanent Waterways Commission, with whatever power is required to make it effective. The reasonable expectation of the people will not be met unless the Congress provides at this session for the beginning and prosecution of the actual work of waterway improvement and control. The Congress should recognize in fullest fashion the fact that the subject of the conservation of our natural resources, with which this Commission deals, is literally vital for the future of the nation.

Numerous bills granting water-power rights on navigable streams have been introduced. None of them give the Government the right to make a reasonable charge for the valuable privileges so granted, in spite of the fact that these water-power privileges are equivalent to many thousands of acres of the best coal lands for their production of power. Nor is any definite time limit set, as should always be done in such cases. I shall be obliged hereafter, in accordance with the policy stated in a recent message, to veto any water-power bill which does not provide for a time limit and for the right of the President or of the Secretary concerned to fix and collect such a charge as he may find to be just and reasonable in each case.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 25, 1908.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3023.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senate to consider the amendments which have not been acted on and which have been heretofore reported by the Committee on Finance. I ask that the amendment of the committee on page 3 of the last print of the bill be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 3, line 7, after the words "equal in amount to," strike out the words:

Seventy-five per cent of the market value, as fixed by the Treasurer of the United States, of the bonds so deposited.

And insert:

Ninety per cent of the market value, but not in excess of the par value of any bonds so deposited, such market value to be ascertained and determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury,

So as to read:

Provided, however, That in case the applications from associations in any State shall not be equal to the amount which the associations of such State would be entitled to under this method of distribution, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, to meet an emergency, assign the amount not thus applied for to any applying association or associations in States in the same section of the country. Whenever after receiving notice of such approval any such association shall deposit with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States such of the bonds described in section 2 of this act as shall be approved in character and amount by the Treasurer of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, it shall be entitled to receive, upon the order of the Comptroller of the Currency, circulating notes in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, equal in amount to 90 per cent of the market value, but not in excess of the par value of any bonds so deposited, such market value to be ascertained and determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, such additional circulating notes to be used, held, and treated in the same way as circulating notes of national banking associations heretofore issued and secured by a deposit of United States bonds, and shall be subject to all the provisions of law affecting such notes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just stated.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, let me understand the proceeding. Are we to understand that the bill is now being read for committee amendments, after which individual Senators may propose amendments?

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill has been once read, when certain committee amendments were adopted and other committee amendments were passed over. The amendments which are now being stated are the committee amendments which heretofore were passed over. I have asked the Senate now to first consider these committee amendments and then, of course, any individual amendments will be in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment just stated will be agreed to. The next committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The next committee amendment passed over was, in section 2, on page 4, line 15, after the word "taxes," to strike out "or the first mortgage bonds of any railroad company, not including street railway bonds, which has paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly and continuously on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than five years previous to the deposit of the bonds."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment passed over was, on page 5, line 4, after the words "of the," to strike out "municipal and railroad," so as to read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain information with reference to the value and character of the securities authorized to be accepted under the provisions of this section, and he shall from time to time furnish information to national banking associations as to such bonds as would be acceptable as security under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 5, on page 8, line 6, after the word "deposits," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That not more than $9,000,000 of lawful money shall be deposited during any calendar month for this purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment passed over was, in section 8, page 10, line 4, after the words "SEC. 8," to strike out:

That national banking associations located outside of reserve or central reserve cities, which are now required by law to keep a reserve equal to 15 per cent of their deposit liabilities, shall hereafter hold at all times at least two-thirds of such reserve in lawful money. The.

And to insert the words "That the," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to the reserves of national banking associations, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that that amendment be further passed over. The committee will report some amendment to that amendment later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be further passed over at the request of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the committee amendments have been concluded, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendments have all been agreed to with the exception of one which has been further passed over.

Mr. LODGE. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 4, line 15, after the word "taxes," it is proposed to insert "bonds of the insular government of Porto Rico."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which has been stated. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. LODGE. I ought, perhaps, to make a statement. I did not suppose threre would be any objection to the Porto Rican bonds. There are a million of bonds of the government of Porto Rico, and they come entirely within the classification of Territorial and municipal bonds.

Mr. CLAY. Let that amendment be read again, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. LODGE.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think there is no objection to that amendment. It seems to me that it is in the line of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the question on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes an additional amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, after the amendment just adopted, it is proposed to insert "bonds of the government of the Philippine Islands and bonds of the city of Manila."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will state what those bonds are. They are not railroad bonds at all; they are government and city bonds coming within the description of those already in the bill. They consist of the friar land bonds, issued under authority of Congress by the act of July 1, 1902, $7,000,000; Philippine public-improvement bonds, first and second issue, amounting to $3,500,000; Manila sewer and water bonds, two issues, amounting to $3,000,000; in all $13,500,000. They are, I repeat, city and government bonds, and not railroad bonds.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. The principal of those bonds is not guaranteed by the Government, as I understand it?

Mr. LODGE. These bonds are not guaranteed by the United States.

Mr. CLAY. None of them? Is any of the interest guaranteed by the Government of the United States?

Mr. LODGE. It is not. They are simply bonds of the government of the Philippine Islands. They are bonds of that government and bonds of the city of Manila—municipal bonds. The others are in the same class as State or Territorial bonds. The railroad bonds are omitted altogether.

Mr. CLAY. Has the Senator from Massachusetts any idea where those bonds are held? Are they held here?

Mr. LODGE. They are all held in this country. I do not know by whom. Those bonds were all taken in New York.

Mr. CLAY. They are guaranteed by the Philippine government?

Mr. LODGE. They are the bonds of the Philippine government, just like the bonds of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. And bonds of the city of Manila?

Mr. LODGE. And bonds of the city of Manila; like bonds of the city of New York or of Boston. They are nothing but municipal and government bonds.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, according to the theory of this bill, these bonds ought not to be included. They do not come within the provisions of this bill. The Senator from Massachusetts says they are the same as Territorial bonds. I beg to differ with him.

Mr. LODGE. I said that they were the same in character as Territorial bonds.

Mr. TELLER. They are not the same in character.

Mr. LODGE. I think they are.

Mr. TELLER. They have no such relation.

Mr. LODGE. It is a difference of opinion.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, nobody can tell what our relation to that country will be in the future. People who bought these bonds have taken their chances. There is no reason why these bonds should be put in this bill now and why we ought to accept them, when we have refused to accept, for instance, railroad bonds. They are certainly bonds of doubtful value, with uncertainty as to what the future condition is going to be there. There is no obligation on our part to take care of these bonds. There is no control over them, either State or municipal, and the General Government has no control over them.

I do not know why the members of the committee ought not to have passed, at least, on this proposition. I do not know how the chairman feels about it, but I know the committee did not pass upon the question, and I know the committee would not have passed upon it favorably had the matter been before the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is correct in his statement. This matter was called up in the Committee of Finance, and by a vote of the committee it was decided that this amendment should not be reported. I think the committee remains of the same opinion still. I should prefer, myself, to let this matter go over until the committee can have a further opportunity to ascertain the facts about the exact nature of these bonds—just what bonds they are and under what authority of law they are issued.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be allowed, I can state all that. These bonds are issued under acts of Congress by authority of the United States Government.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] speaks of them as being of doubtful value. They were selling in February, the friar land bonds at 107½; the Philippine improvement bonds, first issue, at 109; the second issue at 108, and the Manila bonds at 109. They vary, of course, as to the time when they are due. They are payable after 1914 and due from 1934 to 1937.

Mr. FRYE. What interest do they carry?

Mr. LODGE. I think they are fours. I have a note from the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to this matter, which reads as follows:

> Replying to your inquiry, I beg to say that the Treasury Department, when the deposit of public moneys with the various national banks is reduced, requires that bonds other than the following be first withdrawn:
> That is, these are the bonds to which the Treasury gives a preference in deposits.
> United States, District of Columbia three-sixty-fives, Philippine, city of Manila, Porto Rican, Hawaiian, and Philippine Railway Company—

These bonds have been already authorized by act of Congress as security for Government deposits, and they are given a preference by the Government over all other bonds, except bonds of the United States and bonds of the District of Columbia. They sell at a premium, and it seems to me that it is the greatest possible injustice to discriminate against bonds which we have authorized the government of that dependency to issue. They are small loans, amply provided for by sinking funds, and their standing is shown by the quotations which I have read here. For the interest and principal of the bonds ample sinking funds have been provided.

Mr. President, we have put in, very properly, the Porto Rican bonds, and it seems to me to deliberately discriminate against bonds of this public character, issued with our sanction by this dependency, is discrediting securities which we ourselves have authorized.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I desire to ask if these bonds are guaranteed by the Government of the United States?

Mr. LODGE. They are not.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any information as to the revenues of the Philippine Islands or of the city of Manila that would justify him in expressing an opinion as to whether or not they are sufficient to pay these bonds when they become due?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the revenues of the Philippine government exceed the total expenditures in the past fiscal year by $2,000,000—that is, they had an excess of revenue over expenditures of nearly $3,000,000—and, of course, part of their expenditures included the sinking fund and the interest account on these bonds.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it is not a question about the value of these bonds. They may be valuable, but we do not know whether they are or not. We can not know unless we know something of what will be the future history of that section of the world. We do not know that now, and we can not know it. At the present time, of course, we practically direct the finances of that country, but whether we will continue to do so nobody here knows. They are not American bonds; they are not national bonds; they are not city bonds or municipal bonds.

The committee, Mr. President, put in this bill a provision in regard to railroad bonds. It was thought by a majority of the members of the committee on first consideration that it would be wise to do that. Personally I am in favor of the provision in regard to railroad bonds, because I believed it would make it easier for the banks to get such bonds and to issue this emergency money when business conditions demanded such issue. It was thought best by the committee subsequently to strike them out, because there was some objection to that class of bonds. Nobody will pretend that under the provisions of the bill as it first came from the committee railroad bonds are not safer bonds than the bonds to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers.

I have another objection to this proposition. Personally I do not want to do anything that will tie the Philippines to this country. I hope I shall live long enough to see the American people wash their hands of the Philippine Islands and turn them over to somebody—I do not know who, but if we should have war with Japan, we would not probably have any great trouble with the islands after the war commenced, because Japan would probably walk in and take possession of them. However, I am not particularly frightened about a war with Japan, but we do not want to attach ourselves to those islands in a way that will lead to embarrassment when we come to deal with them.

We have adopted a policy in this bill to confine the securities to be accepted to certain State, county, and municipal bonds, and we have stricken out everything else. I do not think it is fair to put in the bonds of the Philippine Islands. The committee—and I recall the fact now, though I did not when I first spoke—actually voted that they would not put those bonds in the bill. We kept them out by a vote.

I want to say another word. I am very much disposed to vote for this bill; but it is with some difficulty that I am able to do so. If I vote for it at all, I will vote for it as it came from the committee. I do not know but that there may be some valuable amendments put on, but I doubt whether there will be, and I think the bill ought to go through without any embarrassment by provisions that it is not necessary to insert. I suppose everybody knows the bill will probably have a hard road to travel before it becomes a law, even if we pass it without such provisions, and every time that we add one of these extra things we make it more difficult.

I believe the bill would have been better with the railroad bond provision in it than it is without it, but I consented that the railroad bond provision should go out because I believed it would make it easier to enact the bill into law. I do not believe that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will help it and I do not see any reason why the bonds which he seeks to include should be incorporated in the provisions of the bill. They are probably bringing their full value now, and we do not need them in this emergency business. We can get along without them, and I do not see why we should put them in.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, Congress has already declared that the bonds of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, dependencies of the United States, are ample and fit security to be preferred to all other security, except the bonds of the United States and those of the District of Columbia, for Government deposits, which represent the money of the people deposited in the banks. If they are suitable for that purpose, as Congress has adjudged, surely they are suitable for the guaranty of a bank note of a temporary character.

The fact that we allow these bonds to be used as security, it seems to me, has no bearing whatsoever on the question whether we are going to tie the Philippine Islands closer to us. We are much more likely, if we are proposing to get rid of the islands, to rid ourselves of them if their credit is good, than if we wantonly damage their credit. They have an ample surplus of revenue; the bonds stand high in the market; they are given preference by the Treasury, and, it seems to me, from every point of view it is a mistake as to these bonds—and there is only a small amount of them altogether—to cause to them the injury which a refusal to put them in this bill undoubtedly would cause.

I understand that the proposition in regard to these bonds has never come to a vote in the committee. The question was considered there, but it was passed over and they were not included in the bill. I am very willing to let this amendment go over and let the matter be considered by the committee to-morrow, if the chairman so desires, before we complete action on this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should be very much gratified if the Senator would permit that. We will have a meeting of the commitee to-morrow morning to consider this amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the amendment be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an independent section to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. That all of said national banking associations designated as depositaries of public money and receiving such money on deposit shall pay to the United States, through the Secretary of the Treasury, interest upon such deposit at such rate as the said Secretary may prescribe, not less, however, than the rate of 1½ per cent per annum upon the average monthly balance of said deposit.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator that he make the minimum 1 per cent instead of 1½ per cent.

Mr. NELSON. I will agree to that if the Finance Committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. As one member of that committee, I am opposed to the proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, unless the Senator from Minnesota desires to present his views as to why the amendment should be adopted, I desire to oppose it.

Mr. NELSON. I suppose I will have the right to reply to the Senator from Illinois, so he may proceed.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have the amendment read again. I mistook the amendment. The Senator from Minnesota has another one, which I thought he had offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

The Secretary again read the amendment of Mr. NELSON.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, it is with some hesitency that I differ from the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] upon a proposition of this kind, but this question was before the Senate a year ago, and, with other Republican Senators, I cast my vote in opposition to it. I have seen no reason from that time to this to change the position I then took. I recognize, however, that we have recently passed through a financial panic which has no parallel, perhaps, in the history of our country—a panic which has required, or through which, at least, the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President, placed with the different banks over $200,000,000. It may be that this with the people generally has led to the idea that interest should be demanded and deposited with the national banks.

The principal argument that is offered, Mr. President, by those who favor the national banks paying interest upon these deposits is that the various States and counties and municipalities in the Republic require interest to be paid on the several sums that are deposited by the States, counties, and municipalities in banks. To my mind this statement has no analogy to the present situation. The State has no authority to issue bills of credit or money. It holds an entirely different relation to the people than does the Federal Government.

Again, Mr. President, the levying of taxes, the collecting of them, and the disbursing of them, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, is entirely different from the levying of taxes, collecting of them, and disbursing of them by the State or the county or the municipality. In the State, county, and municipality, under the revenue laws of the various States, there is a specified time when the assessments are made and placed upon the various revenue books from the State down to the lowest municipality. There is a stated time when this money shall be collected, and there is also a stated time when this money is to be disbursed; so that the State treasurer or the county treasurer or the treasurer of the municipality, as the case may be, knows months in advance when that money is to be collected and placed in the treasury of the State, the county, or the municipality. It may be, and is, as a rule, the fact that many months may pass from the time the money is received in the treasury of the State before the treasurer is authorized by law to distribute it by paying the State debt or paying the expenses of the State government. The State in this case stands practically as an individual who has a large sum of money on hand that he is holding for the purpose of liquidating an indebtedness due at some time in the future, and not desiring to have the money lie idle, puts it in a savings bank to obtain interest upon it during this period when it can not be used to liquidate his indebtedness. He goes to a commercial bank for that purpose. The relations between the individual and the State are precisely the same, because the bank that handles the money of the State or the county or the municipality is not the fiscal agent of the State. It has no such relation to the people as have the national banks that are Government depositaries.

The relation of debtor and creditor in the case of deposits of State and municipal funds is established precisely as it would be if the money had been placed on deposit by an individual at a certain stipulated rate of interest.

In the whole history of our Government, Mr. President, this plan suggested in the pending amendment has never been adopted. It should not be adopted now without the most careful examination of the subject and mature deliberation on the part of the Senate. If the amendment that has been proposed here looking to the Government exacting interest upon deposits that may be made by the Secretary of the Treasury in any of the national banks should be adopted, we would change, in my judgment, the fiscal policy of the Government that has been in existence certainly ever since the creation of the national-bank system.

It may not be amiss, Mr. President, to call to the attention of the Senators the financial condition of our country under the policy that was inaugurated by General Jackson when he took the Government deposits from the United States Bank and placed the money with the various State banks. We are told by financial writers who have given much study to the industrial and financial history of the Government that while this destroyed the United States Bank, which during its whole life had been the fiscal agent of the Government, it stimulated a spirit of business enterprise and reckless investments that ultimately led to the panic of 1837 and nearly wrecked the United States Treasury itself. In a review of the conditions about this time by Howell Cobb, the Secretary of the Treasury in 1857, he calls attention to the fact that the Government on its books had in its Treasury $34,187,143.29, and that out of this vast amount there was available for general purposes only $1,085,498.32; of this sum of money the banks held $24,994,158.37; and when the Secretary of the Treasury called on the banks for the return of this money they were unable to meet the demands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

This money that had been taken from the United States Bank and deposited with the several banks of the States, together with the revenues that were received from day to day, had increased the volume of currency in the banks to such an extent that reckless investments were made in every direction and the various banks financed almost any enterprise that would come along, until the point was reached where confidence was lost in the credit of the country, and when that was lost there was not sufficient money in the banks of the State to meet the demands for the instrumentalities of trade, and this period of wild speculation resulted in wholesale failures in every State in the Union; and, as I have said, the Government itself was unable to collect as its needs required the $24,994,158.37 that it had deposited in the banks of the States.

It was this experience, Mr. President, that led later, in 1846, to the placing upon the statute books of our country what is known as the "Independent Treasury system"—a system that from that time to this has been a part of the financial machinery of the Government of the United States in collecting and disbursing the revenues of the Government. Many criticised this Independent Treasury system when it was inaugurated and made a law, and many have criticised it since, but that it has served a good purpose during all this period must be evident, Mr. President, to every student of finance in this country.

From the time of the enactment of the Independent Treasury system in 1846, until some time after the enactment of the present national-bank laws, the revenues of the Government were held in the Treasury of the United States and these various subtreasuries; but gradually, to meet the convenience of the public and serve the interest of the Government, various national banks have from time to time been designated as Government depositaries, and have been used as fiscal agents by the Government in connection with the subtreasuries to receive and disburse the Government's money. As Senators all know, until the national banks were organized in 1863 the Federal Government did not undertake to furnish the currency of the country as a circulating medium throughout the various States of the Republic. The State banks were permitted under their several charters and under the decisions of the court to issue their notes, which passed, wherever the bank was known to be solvent, current among men who were willing to receive them in lieu of gold or silver. But when the national-bank act was passed by Congress, the Government for the first time in its history undertook to deprive all State banks of the privilege of issuing notes to be used as a medium of exchange by taxing their issue 10 per cent. This tax was made large enough so as to make it unprofitable for State banks to issue notes to be used as currency; and at the same time provision was made for each national-bank association that received its charter from the Government to take the bonds of the Government and issue a certain percentage of notes on those bonds, which to-day pass as readily as greenbacks or gold or silver as the money of the country. From that time to the present the Federal Government has taken upon itself the responsibility of furnishing to the people of this country a currency adequate in volume to meet the demands of commerce and trade. To do this it has furnished the gold and silver certificates that are in circulation, the Treasury notes known as greenbacks, and the national-bank notes which to-day have reached the enormous volume of $562,727,614.

Now, no State, county, or municipality has any such authority or power under the Constitution of our common country. These have no greater or different right, so far as furnishing a currency to the country is concerned, under existing law than an individual, and hence, as I have said, Mr. President, there is no analogy between a State exacting interest upon deposits, or a county, and the Federal Government. Now, the Federal Government has found it convenient, in serving the public interests in the collection and disbursement of its revenues, to use these national banks as fiscal agents. Money that otherwise would be locked up in the Treasury and subtreasuries of the Government and thus taken out of the channels of trade, has been placed in these national banks in order to keep as large an amount of currency in circulation as is required by the demands of trade and commerce. This has been notably true during periods of financial stringency, and it is notably true, too, at various seasons of the year, especially at the crop-moving season when larger sums of money are demanded in the West and the Southwest, where the cotton crop of the South and the wheat and corn crop of the West have to be moved.

Mr. President, only a year ago, by an amendment that was offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], it was provided that in designating the Government depositaries the Secretary of the Treasury should consider all sections of our common country. Why was it? Was it to benefit some individual bank? Not at all. It was for the purpose of distributing this large sum of money that daily and weekly and monthly comes into the Treasury of the United States all over this country for the benefit of the people themselves.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will.

Mr. NELSON. Do not the banks loan out the money which is deposited with them by the Government to the public and charge interest for it? They do not conduct that part of the business as an eleemosynary institution; as a matter of charity. Does the Senator undertake to say that the money which the Government leaves with the banks is left there as a matter of charity for the banks to distribute among the people? Do they not mix it with their other funds and loan it out and get interest on it?

Mr. HOPKINS. Of course they do; and that is the intention when the money goes into the various banks. But I wish to know how the Senator from Minnesota is going to obtain any consolation from that. If the money were kept in the banks the people would not get any benefit from it. Does the Senator suppose that if an interest charge of 1½ per cent or 2 per cent is made on the Government deposits the banks are going to pay it? Not at all. The people who borrow money will be compelled to pay it in the extra interest that is charged. It is an utter impossibility to regulate this by legislation here. If the banks are required to take this money as Government depositaries and pay 1½ or 2 per cent interest upon it, then the person who goes to the bank to obtain any part of that money will be required to pay that much more interest. So nothing will be gained for the general public. It comes right back to the proposition——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will.

Mr. NELSON. If these large city banks can afford to pay 2 per cent on the balances of the country banks, why can they not afford to pay the Government a little? They mingle the money they get from the country banks with Federal money and loan it out and speculate and make profit on it. Why is it any greater hardship for the banks to pay interest to the Government than it is for the banks to pay interest to the country banks?

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Minnesota misconceives this proposition entirely. It is not a question whether the banks can afford to do it or can not afford to do it. It is a question whether the people from whom this money is taken by the revenue system we have shall be required to pay a greater rate of interest when they go to the banks to borrow money than they would under other conditions.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator have any information that the banks which get this money from the Government loan it to the people at any less rate than they do any other money?

Mr. HOPKINS. That is aside from the question entirely. It has no bearing upon it. It does not make any difference whether they do or do not. We know that if the banks are required to pay interest on the deposits, they will put the money out at a profit. We know that. If they do put it out at a profit, they are going to charge the person who borrows the money a higher rate of interest than they otherwise would.

There is another proposition in connection with this to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota and other Senators who feel as he does, that interest should be paid on these Government deposits, and that is this: Under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and under the clear reading of the statute itself that permits national banks to become Government depositaries, the Government never loses control of the money.

The money in a bank that is made a Government depositary is public money as much as that in the subtreasury or in the Treasury itself, and section 5489 of the Revised Statutes of the United States makes the banker an embezzler if he is unable to pay that money whenever it is demanded by the Secretary of the Treasury. You change that relation entirely——

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. Just a moment. You change entirely the relation between the Government and the banks the moment you undertake to charge interest upon the Government deposits. Under present conditions the banks are simply fiscal agents of the Government of the United States. They hold the same relation to the Secretary of the Treasury as does the subtreasury at Chicago or New York or wherever those subtreasuries are located. They are governed by the same rules and the same regulations, and the money that they have is the money of the Government of the United States the same as the money in the Treasury.

Mr. President, you change that and require interest and you establish a contractual relation between the banks and the Government. You make a contract between them which entirely destroys this fiscal agency that has always been the marked feature of these deposits, and make the relation of debtor and creditor to exist between the two. In other words, you destroy the power of the Government of the United States to make an embezzler of a banker if he fails to respond with the money. His relation then to the Government is that of any other person who makes a deposit and makes an arrangement by which he is to have a certain compensation for it.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator seems to have answered the question which I wanted to ask him when I rose. I should like to ask him, however, whether in his opinion, if this amendment is adopted, making a charge of one and a half per cent interest, or not less than that, it would change the relation, so that the banker could not be prosecuted if he embezzled the money?

Mr. HOPKINS. I undertake to say that if that arrangement is made, section 5489 can not apply to it. That applies——

Mr. FLINT. I want to ask the Senator a question. Then we simply ought to amend that section, too?

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well; you have to revise the criminal code of the United States in order to do that.

Mr. FLINT. We certainly ought to amend that section if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS. You have to do it if it is to be made a crime for the banker to fail to return the money on a contract to borrow money and pay interest upon it, a relation this amendment makes.

But I want to suggest to the Senator from California: Would it not be an anomaly in criminal law to make an embezzler of a man when you make a contract with him and require that he shall pay you a certain amount for the use of money, if he does not return it? Has the Senator in his whole experience as a lawyer ever met an example of that kind? Is there either in the Federal or the State courts a case of the kind?

I maintain, Mr. President, there is not, and the reason why we can hold the banker as an embezzler under existing law is because this is public money and not the money of the bank. The bank is a fiscal agent of the Government.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will.

Mr. NELSON. Do not the bankers who receive this public money mingle it with their other money? Do they keep it as a special deposit? If they mix it with their own money and handle it as they do their other funds, is not that practically a conversion? And if the Senator's theory is correct, is it not true that every national bank that has received Government deposits, the moment it uses those deposits and mingles them with their other funds, is guilty of embezzlement?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. One at a time, please.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOPKINS. Only one at a time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. Of course a banker who takes the money of the Government on deposit takes it at his hazard, and if he is unable to respond when the Government calls on him, under the section of the statutes to which I have referred he is an embezzler. That is one of the hazards taken by the banker. It is no secret among people managing national banks that the great majority of national banks are not anxious to take deposits of this kind. The hazard is too great even under existing conditions for them to take the money and be ready to respond at any time to any demand that may be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. The hazard, however, would be increased if the criminal law should be changed as suggested by the Senator from California and interest be required upon Government deposits.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I simply want to state to the Senator from Illinois that I do not suggest that the criminal law be amended. On the contrary, I do not think it needs to be amended. I was answering the Senator by stating that if his contention were true, all that would be required would be to change one section of the statute.

Mr. HOPKINS. If my contention is true, all you have to do is to make a new criminal code and then let the courts determine whether it can be enforced. It would be an anomaly, I say, to make a criminal of a man who takes money, agreeing to pay interest, if he does not repay that money when demanded.

Mr. FLINT. I want to ask the Senator a question. If the Secretary of the Treasury requires the proper security, as it is presumed he will, how is there any possibility of the Government making any loss in connection with these deposits?

Mr. HOPKINS. The Secretary of the Treasury in 1837, and for a number of years thereafter, while he was making deposits in State banks, supposed he was taking the necessary security to make his Government deposits safe, but there was $24,000,000 of money in the State banks that the Secretary was unable to get, and that led, as I stated before, to the establishment of what is known as the Independent Treasury system in this country.

There is another suggestion——

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me proceed for a moment. There is another suggestion that I desire to present to Senators upon this subject. If, as I have said, these deposits are placed in the banks for the purpose of raising revenue on the surplus money in the Treasury, and no other purpose, why exclude either the cotton growers of the South or the wheat growers of the Dakotas from borrowing this money from the Government on the products of their country? Why deny the corn growers of Iowa or in that rich corn belt in Illinois the right to obtain money from the Treasury of the United States on giving ample security in order for them to take the rich corn that is grown in these sections of the country and market it? You can see, Mr. President, that the more this subject is considered the stronger appear the reasons why the Government should never embark in a scheme of depositing its money in any bank, either State or national, under conditions where the bank agrees to pay a certain interest for the daily, weekly, or monthly balances that the Government sees fit to place in such a bank.

I confess to some surprise, Mr. President, that men trained in legislation, as many of the Senators are who advocate interest on Government deposits, should seek by this amendment to commit the Government to a policy that is new and untried, a policy that not only gives countenance and character to the policies and principles advocated by the Populistic party, but to a policy that would lead to disastrous results in the end. We would utimately, Mr. President, have a recurrence of the conditions that existed after the removal of the Government deposits from the United States Bank under Jackson to the State banks in the several States of the Union.

If we are to break down the policy that has governed and controlled this country for a hundred years, Mr. President, why not make it broad enough so that all classes of citizens can get the benefit of the surplus money that is in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I do not understand that there is any plan on foot to accept cotton or wheat or any other article. We are going to accept the same securities that we now accept. The only change that is proposed by this amendment is that the Treasury is to charge not less than 1½ per cent interest on its balances in the banks. I do not understand that the plan of the Government in making Government deposits is to be changed in the least by this amendment. Does the Senator understand there is to be any change?

Mr. HOPKINS. Of course, that is true. But I say if this is to be adopted, why not broaden it so as to permit all classes of citizens to get the benefit of it? I know of no reason why a national bank as such should have any favors from the Government of the United States on Government deposits. I know of no reason why we should select them as beneficiaries. If we are to embark on a new principle by taking the surplus money in the Treasury of the United States and loaning it until such time as the Government wishes to use it, then I say the cotton growers of Texas are entitled to their share; the cotton growers of Mississippi are enitled to borrow this money equally with the banks. In other words, we are tending to the populistic principle that was contended for in Nebraska years ago, and that is that the people who go to the Treasury with good securities should have a right to borrow Government money.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. PILES. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if section 5489 applies to the question he now has under discussion? He has studied that section.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have looked at it very carefully.

Mr. PILES. Does the Senator think that section applies to Government deposits in national banks?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think it does.

Mr. PILES. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the language of the section:

> If the Treasurer of the United States, or any assistant treasurer—

It applies to the Treasurer of the United States, mark you—> or any public depositary, fails safely to keep all moneys deposited by any disbursing officer or disbursing agent, as well as all moneys deposited by any receiver, collector, or other person having moneys of the United States, he shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement.

Mr. HOPKINS. The national bank is a Government depositary.

Mr. PILES. It certainly is; but that refers to moneys deposited by disbursing officers, receivers, and so forth, and not to Government deposits in national banks.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no; money deposited by a collector. Take Peoria, Ill., for example.

Mr. PILES. But the language of the statute——

Mr. HOPKINS. In Peoria the Government collections amount to millions of dollars. They deposit the money in national banks instead of going to the subtreasury; and that statute has been construed by the Government officials to apply to this very condition; and if the Senator will go to the Secretary of the Treasury he will find, I think, that he puts the same construction upon that statute that I do here to-day.

Mr. PILES. Has there ever been any decision rendered in line with the argument made by the Senator from Illinois? I have read this statute, and I desire to say that I have given it only a few moments' consideration. There are certain Government officers who deposit money in national banks, for instance, the men who pay off——

Mr. HOPKINS. But there are others, too. Take, for example, Quincy, Ill. Within the last month the Secretary of the Treasury has directed the postmaster and the collector to make their deposits in certain banks and to disburse the money from the national banks. It is also done at Peoria, where the Government receives and disburses millions of dollars.

Mr. PILES. If the Senator will permit me for a moment, I will try to make my point clear to him. There are certain officials of the Government who are charged with disbursing Government money, like a pay officer in the United States Army. This statute, as I read it, hurriedly, as I say, applies to officers of that character.

Mr. HOPKINS. And to others, too.

Mr. PILES. It does not apply, as I read it, to money deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury in national banks, because the language is this:

If the Treasurer of the United States, or any assistant treasurer, or any public depositary—

That includes a bank, of course—fails safely to keep all moneys deposited by—

By whom? By the Treasurer of the United States? No. By—any disbursing officer or disbursing agent, as well as all moneys deposited by any receiver, collector—of customs, for instance—or other person having moneys of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will not take further time with the Senator from Washington. I have given him my construction of the statute, and it is the construction of the Department, as I understand.

As I have said, you take the national banks that are made Government depositaries at Peoria, Ill. They receive and disburse millions of dollars of money and come clearly within the provisions of that law.

It is not my purpose to take much further of the time of the Senate upon this proposition. To my mind it is a monstrous doctrine for the Government of the United States to become a creditor in the manner proposed by this amendment. The happy condition for the people of this country to be in would be where the revenues simply equal the expenditures that are made for the Government, so that we never would have a great surplus and never a deficit. But under conditions as they exist every person familiar with governmental affairs knows we sometimes have a deficit in the Treasury and at other times we have a large surplus. Now, is it not remarkable that Senators should be willing to keep upon the statute books of our country a law that creates a large surplus in the Treasury, money which comes from the pockets of the people, and then, as is proposed in this amendment, have that Government become a creditor and loan the money to the banks, so that the banks can in turn loan it at a high rate of interest to the people from whom it was taken by taxation? It seems to me, Mr. President, that the founders of this Republic—the great men who formed this great instrument that to-day unites the forty-six States in one great Republic—would turn in their graves if they believed that their descendants or the representatives of their descendants in this legislative body had so construed the Constitution that the Government upon the one hand can collect money from the people, put it in the Treasury, and then loan it through various instrumentalities back to the very people and take interest upon it.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator think that under a well-regulated Government we can, under any circumstances, justify the course of collecting a surplus equal to two hundred and fifty or three hundred million dollars from the people, which is not needed to pay the actual expenses of this Government, and deposit the money in the Treasury and take it out of the channels of trade? Under a well-regulated Government ought we to collect any more money than is needed for the purpose of paying the actual expenses of the Government, and is it not true that to allow a surplus of that amount to accumulate in the Treasury is manifestly wrong and unjust?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have just stated that the ideal governmental situation would be where the revenues would just equal the expenditures of the Government, and where we would have no great surplus and never have a deficit. But the Senator from Georgia knows, or at least he ought to know, that the trade conditions of the country are such that no man or set of men can make estimates so that you can properly adjust the revenues and expenditures so that there will not be at times a deficit and at other times a surplus. The condition at the present time is that we are spending more money than we are receiving, and if the Senator will look at the accounts that are given us from day to day by the Secretary of the Treasury he will see that really this is becoming an academic question, because under existing law this surplus that he speaks of will soon be expended in paying the legitimate expenses of the Government.

But I protest, for one, Mr. President, against this Government, by the adoption of this amendment, embarking upon a new policy upon this question, and I do it because I believe that we will break down all of the safeguards that up to this time have protected the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] at the last session of Congress, believing that it was not good policy to force the national banks to pay to the Government of the United States interest on its deposits. On mature reflection of that proposition I think that my vote was not wisely cast. I do not believe, sir, that this Government can afford to deposit its money with national banks without requiring such banks to pay reasonable compensation for the use of the money. Every State in the Union, so far as my information goes, requires the banks to pay interest on State funds deposited with the banks. The section of the statute that the Senator from Illinois has referred to has, to my mind, absolutely no application to the case now before the Senate. That section of the statute refers simply to deposits made in banks by the disbursing and other officials therein mentioned. It makes the Treasurer of the United States himself guilty of embezzlement if he fails to safely keep the moneys deposited by any of the officers mentioned in the statute. So far as I know there is no provision of law which makes a national-bank official guilty of embezzlement for failing to pay over to the Government the money deposited by the Government in a national bank. There would seem to be no necessity therefor, because the Government in the first instance, as I understand, requires the bank to furnish additional security to the Government to secure the deposit which the Treasurer makes in the bank.

If practically all the States in the Union required the banks to pay interest on public deposits, if the banks of the country can afford to pay interest on the daily balances of their large customers, like merchants and manufacturers, why, sir, can they not afford to pay the Government interest on the money which they receive from the Government?

It not only gives the bank the use of the money belonging to the people of the country, but it gives the bank a standing in the community which it otherwise would not have. There is not a bank in the United States to-day which is not anxious to have the Government designate it as one of its public depositaries. Why? Because it gets not only the use of the Government money, but it is given a standing in the community over other banks which it ordinarily would not have.

So I am myself strongly in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator takes his seat, I wish to ask him about section 5489, to which he has evidently given some attention. Waiving the question as to whether or not the section applies to a bank which is designated as a depositary, the language of the section is that—

If the Treasurer of the United States, or any assistant treasurer, or any public depositary, fails safely to keep all moneys deposited by any disbursing officer or disbursing agent—

And so forth—

he shall be guilty of embezzlement of the moneys not so safely kept—

And so forth.

Evidently this section does not contemplate that the money when deposited in a public depositary shall be kept as a special deposit. It evidently contemplates that the money when deposited in the bank shall be mingled with the funds of the bank, and that only when demand is made by the Government upon the bank, and the bank then fails to account for the money, shall it be deemed guilty of embezzlement.

Now, suppose we should adopt a provision compelling the bank to pay interest upon the money thus deposited, I want to ask the Senator how that would alter the relation of the Government to the bank; in other words, how the accidental circumstance that we compel the bank to pay interest on the deposit would make the bank guilty of embezzlement when it would not be guilty of embezzlement if interest was not exacted.

Mr. PILES. I think the section does not apply to the case the Senator from Illinois was discussing at all. In other words, it has absolutely no application. But I do not think that, conceding the liability of the bank official to the charge of embezzlement under the section mentioned, he would be immune from the charge of embezzlement if the bank paid interest on Government deposits.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator that in my opinion the amendment in question would not in any manner affect the interpretation of section 5489.

Mr. PILES. That is the only section I was considering.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the bank should fail to keep the money within the meaning of the section, the bank would be guilty of embezzlement if it paid interest on the deposit precisely the same as if it did not pay interest on it.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to make a suggestion. It is apparent to me that if this amendment is to be adopted there ought to be some change of phraseology in the amendment. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that he allow it to be passed over, and the committee will in the morning take it up with a view of suggesting some amendment perhaps along the line of making it clear, or at least as to what the effect would be if the change is made. I have no disposition to delay action upon it at all or to do anything except to consider before the committee the various questions that have been raised here to-day, and to report our conclusions to-morrow morning at the beginning of the session.

Mr. NELSON. In view of the attitude assumed by the Senator from Illinois on the amendment and without hearing any expression from other members of the committee, I feel as though I would be committing the amendment to a sort of graveyard if it was left to the Finance Committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; the Senator from Minnesota is mistaken about that. For the committee I will say that they will consider the question fairly and report upon it. I do not want the Senator to lose any of his rights on the amendment, and I am only asking him to delay it until we can consider some of the suggestions that have been made here to-day. So far as I am concerned personally, I am not averse to charging interest upon deposits if it can be done with safety to the public interest, I will say very frankly.

Mr. NELSON. Has the Senator any mental reservation?

Mr. ALDRICH. None whatever.

Mr. NELSON. Has the Senator any constitutional reservation?

Mr. ALDRICH. None whatever.

Mr. NELSON. Or no constitutional scruples?

Mr. ALDRICH. None whatever.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator has got over all his scruples on the question?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; not over my scruples, but I want to see just what the effect of the amendment would be upon the law in relation to embezzlement, and so forth, so far as we can find out by an examination between now and to-morrow morning.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator agree to a yea-and-nay vote to-morrow?

Mr. ALDRICH. Absolutely.

Mr. NELSON. All right. Let the amendment go over until to-morrow, and we can have a yea-and-nay vote on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the question will be submitted to the committee for an early report.

Mr. ALDRICH. To-morrow morning.

Mr. TELLER. Therefore I do not care about making the remarks, which I would have made if the amendment had been kept before the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer another amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to offer an amendment and have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 8. That from and after the 1st day of June, 1908, every national banking association organized under the act of June 3, 1864, and any act supplemental or amendatory thereof, shall at all times have on hand in lawful money of the United States an amount equal to at least 15 per cent of the aggregate amount of its deposits, and whenever the lawful money of any such association shall be below the amount of 15 per cent of its deposits such association shall not increase its liability by making any new loans otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight. Nor shall such banking association make or pay any dividend of its profits until the required proportion of the aggregate amount of its deposits and its lawful money of the United States so intended to be held in reserve shall have been fully restored, and the Comptroller of the Currency shall notify any such association whose lawful money reserves are below the amount above required to be kept on hand to make good such reserves, and if such association shall fail for thirty days thereafter to make good its reserves of lawful money the Comptroller of the Currency shall, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, proceed to wind up the business of such association, as provided in section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

No part of the lawful money reserves which such national banking association is hereby required to have on hand in lawful money of the United States shall consist of anything but lawful money of the United States actually in the possession and custody of such national banking association.

All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with any of the foregoing provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Senator proceeds, if I do not interrupt him, I would be glad to ask him a question with reference to the amendment just proposed.

The existing law provides that reserve banks and central reserve banks shall keep 25 per cent, and that so-called "country banks" shall keep 15 per cent. As I caught the reading of the amendment from the desk, it appears to apply 15 per cent reserve to all banks. I ask if that was really the intention of the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the intention of the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. CULBERSON. It reduces therefore the reserve in reserve cities and in central reserve cities?

Mr. HEYBURN. It abolishes reserve cities, for every bank is required to keep its reserve in its own vaults. It, in effect, abolishes the central reserve and other reserve banks, and each bank is its custodian of the money required to be held in reserve. So with the adoption of this amendment there is no longer that necessity which impelled the legislation requiring central reserve banks to keep a larger percentage in reserve than other banks, because the excess required to be carried by central reserve banks was in view of the fact that it held the reserve of other banks.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this amendment at great length, but I regard it as a most important provision in the bill. There is no provision of this class of financial legislation that is of such universal interest as the reserve clause. The panics, so called, that we have had in the last thirty years have been because of an improper distribution of the wealth of the country, and not because of an insufficiency in the volume of the wealth of the country; and the improper distribution has come in every case because of the reserve provisions in our financial laws, the provisions which permit what are known as the country banks—and that includes every bank outside of the central reserve cities—to send three-fifths of their lawful money reserves to a center of financial agitation, and then when it is needed at home to transact the business of the community where the money belongs it is not available. That has been the trouble. The most eminent financiers we have had at the head of our financial department have repeatedly called our attention to the fact in their annual reports, and it has been so evident every time that a financial disturbance has come that it seems to me it is time we were taking some notice of it.

There is approximately as much money in existence and in circulation to-day as there was in October. In October we were in the midst of what has been called a "panic." To-day we are in financial tranquillity. That condition is worthy of consideration in determining whether it is necessary to provide for an additional volume of currency, called, in the consideration of this question, "emergency currency."

I do not believe, as I said a few days since in speaking upon this question, that there is any present necessity for legislation upon the financial question that is pressing upon us and demanding our attention. But if there is any question concerning financial legislation that is of sufficient importance to demand our consideration at this time, it is this question of the lawful money reserves of the banks, and to legislate upon the financial question without including the reserve question would be a very gross waste of our time.

Mr. President, there were approximately $500,000,000 of this preferred fund, if I may so denominate the reserves in the country banks, in New York on the 18th day of October. It was there under terms between the bank depositing it and the bank receiving it that upon call it should be available to the bank depositing it, and those banks were proceeding upon the assumption that it would be available when they called for it.

The Comptroller of the Currency has told us that when the country banks demanded that this reserve fund should be made available they were told by the central reserve banks and the other reserve banks that they could not have it except in the shape of clearing-house certificates. We have the best authority in the financial department of the Government for that assertion, and that it was true there can be no question whatever, because it was admitted and asserted on all sides.

What is it makes panics? It is that some persons want money of others who will not make it available to them, whether that be in large or small business transactions. But when $500,000,000 of the money belonging to the depositors in the country banks is tied up and withdrawn from their use, very naturally they feel the effect of it.

When I was discussing this question on a recent occasion I was called to account for using the term "money" and speaking of it as the money of the depositors. Of course, I think every Senator and every person within the sound of my voice understood that I was using the terms "money" and "credit" interchangeably. It is utterly immaterial, when a man deposits a check or cash in a bank to his credit, whether you call it money or credit. Whether the title to the thing deposited passes to the bank in which he deposits it and in lieu of it he receives a credit or not is purely an academic question, and it is a mere waste of time in discussing a question of this kind to attempt to draw technical lines upon the question of the asserted ownership of the money. So I would be understood on this occasion as using the terms "money" and "credit" interchangeably.

The same Senators who criticised my assertion that the money was the money of the depositors in discussing this question spoke of the money of the depositors amounting to $13,000,000,000. There is not that much money in the United States, and there is not that much money deposited, but there is the equivalent of that much money. There is the credit representing that much in value.

I have made some inquiry since we discussed this question before as to the methods that are adopted in banking circles in the arrangement of these lawful reserves. I have inquired of reputable bankers, and I am informed that it is considered quite permissible for a bank out in the West or elsewhere to send to New York City approved securities, deposit them with a central reserve bank, and request that they be given a credit equivalent to the amount of their lawful money reserves, and that the securities are taken by the New York bank and the credit is given; and then the country bank is said to have complied with the law; that it is carrying three-fifths of 15 per cent in the reserve bank in New York in lawful money, when it is doing nothing of the kind. It is carrying a credit in the bank of New York that is backed by approved securities, and no money passes in the transaction.

When the law provided that the banks should carry a given per cent in lawful money reserves it used the term "lawful money" advisedly, because when a man comes to the bank counter for his deposits he is entitled to receive lawful money, and it was intended that there should be available lawful money, not a certificate of credit upon a New York or a Chicago or a St. Louis bank, but lawful money, in order that the depositor might receive that which, whether the identical deposit which belonged to him or not, he was entitled to receive.

Mr. President, some confusion has been evidenced here in the discussion of the question of lawful money reserves. It has been assumed on some occasions that it was tying up the sum represented by the lawful money reserves required to be kept. It is doing nothing of the kind. It is only defining and limiting the use that may be made of that money. Under the existing law, when the available money in the bank is reduced to the limit of the lawful money reserve, it may no longer transact a certain class of business, but it may continue to pay its depositors and to do what you might call a cash business.

That is the reason why the reserves are required to be kept. It is not only, I say, not unlawful to use the reserves in the ordinary transaction of banking business between the depositor and the banker, but it is permissible and it is compellable. A bank can not refuse to pay a depositor because its reserves are reduced below the amount required by law. On the contrary, the depositor can require the bank to pay him to the extent of his credit to the last dollar, regardless of the amount of reserves. A reasonable latitude is given to the bank, a reasonable time in which to recoup the fund from which it has thus drawn against the reserves that were created for the sole and express purpose of paying depositors.

The lawful money reserve provision in the finance act was enacted on behalf of the depositors as against those who do a business at the bank for profit to the bank and to themselves. Those are the two classes of people who engage in banking, and they must be kept distinctly apart in determining the wisdom of the separate and distinct phases of legislation proposed in the pending bill.

I therefore have sent to the desk and had read a provision that is existing law, except that it requires the banks to keep within their own vaults the lawful money reserve. The language in which the amendment is clothed is existing law, except that it changes the per cent required to be kept and makes it uniform, because all banks stand under the amendment upon exactly the same footing. It makes it less than the central reserve banks are required to keep and just what the country banks are required to keep, but requires that it shall be kept in lawful money; not kept out of use, but kept for the use and accommodation of the depositors in the bank, who are the real parties interested in the safety of the money, whether it be deposited as money or as credit.

Mr. President, the eighth section of the bill, as it is before us, proposes—

That the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to the reserves of national banking associations, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries.

That is the only reference in the bill to the reserve clause of the banking act. It expressly exempts the deposits of the United States from the guaranty of reserves required in the case of other deposits.

Of course the answer to the objection which I suggest to that provision is that the United States deposits are already secured by the deposit of securities under another law. That is perhaps a sufficient answer. But it does not follow that section 8 of the bill is sufficient legislation upon the subject of reserves because it has merely picked up and mentioned one of that class of deposits.

It is suggested by an amendment that was offered early in the consideration of the bill that three-fifths of the 15 per cent, which would be 9 per cent, shall be kept by the bank and that one-half of the three-fifths now may be in bonds. Bonds are not available to meet quick demand on the part of a depositor. If a clearing house or a subtreasury of the United States were in the same city or available, it may be possible that if the bonds were of a character that would warrant it and command the service you could convert the bonds into money at any time to meet a demand; but we are 500 miles or thereabouts from a subtreasury. Other sections of the country are even more distant. The subtreasury under no law is required to advance money upon these securities. They are indefinite as to their character, and they are uncertain as to their value.

Of course we all say that municipal securities have a standard value and that you can always rely upon them; and though we make those boastful assertions on behalf of them, many of us have seen the time when you could not take the bonds of your State or your county or your city and get currency for them, not because they were not good, not because they were not worth it, but because the currency was not available.

When a bank is to meet the demand of its depositors, it is currency that must answer and speak for the bank, and to require them to realize in twenty-four or forty-eight hours or in five days upon even the very best securities, when they are as distant as many business points of this country are distant from subtreasuries and financial centers where that class of securities can be realized upon, is to make a very flimsy provision against a run upon a bank and the demand of its depositors, and not a safe one, I think.

It might be that 10 per cent would be found sufficient in cash to fix the confidence of the depositor so that he would not demand his money; it might be that 15 per cent would be sufficient; but we should determine some proportion of the deposits, and we should fix it so that the depositor would know exactly when he put his money in the bank what his risks were.

Fifteen per cent is the lowest reserve provision of to-day The trouble with it is, however, really to fix this reserve. Of the 15 per cent under existing law required to be kept by the banks in general in the country, three-fifths may be loaned to the banks in New York, St. Louis, or Chicago. It is said that it may be deposited. That is a milder term, but, in fact, it is loaned, because the bank receiving it pays interest on it. The relation is established of a borrower and a lender between the bank holding the depositor's money and the bank in New York seeking to take the money and place it in a fund for general purposes.

If there were some restraint upon the reserve banks as to the manner and the extent of the use to which they might apply these reserves, it might be different. But there is none. The bank receiving this sacred fund set aside by the law for the protection of the depositors has no restraint placed upon it whatever by the law. It may loan it to the street-corner speculator, or it may loan it upon any securities that it would loan what might be termed its free money.

There is nothing in the reply that banks must carry a fund against which to make exchange and draw drafts. That is a different class of money. That is free money, as distinguished from the reserve money, and it does not enter into the consideration of this question at all. The bank may carry that in the shape of a credit upon the deposit of securities, or it may carry it upon the strength of actual money deposited, but it is no part of the consideration of this bill. Out of the several hundred letters and answers which I had in regard to the wisdom of allowing the lawful money reserves to be deposited in New York, more than a dozen of the bankers gave as a reason why that they must have a fund in New York against which to draw exchange and drafts, illustrating how illy advised they were as to the nature of the reserves, how competent they were to protect the money of their depositors. In those cases I took care to write them suggesting that they had mistaken the class and the character of these deposits and that I was not referring to the free money which might be made available for that purpose, but to the money that was a fund held sacred to pay depositors up to the last dollar.

No bank should be allowed to close its doors against the payment of money due its depositors so long as it has a cent available for that purpose; and every cent that it has is, under the law, available for that purpose. To enact a bill upon the question of finance at all at this time and to fail to so amend the existing law in regard to this very subject, out of which the late financial flurry grew and which was the origin of it, seems to me would be to fail in the performance of our duty.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to ask the Senator a question for information. Is it the Senator's position that the reserves should be kept in the banks intact and not invested in anything?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not be invested at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Be just simply held there?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understood that to be the Senator's position. Now, the question which occurred to my mind was, whether or not that would not lock up from circulation a very great quantity of money throughout the country, and might it not result in a very serious contraction. That is what I wish to ask the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall reply to the Senator from Indiana. That has been the proposition with which we have always been met—that it would lock up the money. It would lock it up against certain uses; but it would hold it sacred and free and liberal for other uses.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand that; but the question that occurred to my mind as the Senator spoke of it was, if the reserves were kept intact and not used at all, if they were held there against the possible demand on the bank at some time, whether or not a very large sum of money would not be taken out of the uses of commerce?

The Senator certainly knows—I do not—how much money in the aggregate throughout the country would be required to keep these reserves intact. How much would it be, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. HEYBURN. Substantially $900,000,000. That is near enough.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So that proposition would be to lock up $900,000,000 at least from the use of the people?

Mr. HEYBURN. It would not lock it up from the use of the parties who deposited it, but it would simply withdraw it from a certain class of use or investment. It would make it available for a more useful purpose on the part of the owners of the money, whether you count the bank or the depositor the owner of it. It simply says that you shall not speculate with this money beyond a certain margin.

Now, bear in mind, Mr. President, that there is, first, $900,000,000—and I use those figures because they are close enough; they are approximately the average figures—there are $900,000,000 that are supposed to be in existence as the paid-up capital of the national banks, which is presumed to have been paid up when the banks organized and opened their doors for business. The law requires the Comptroller of the Currency to know that it is paid up as a matter of fact. It may be that sometimes a part of that is in promissory notes, but whether it is or not, they are supposed to be good, and there are $900,000,000 that the banks are at liberty to do as they please with.

When the banking law was first enacted, the banks were compelled to carry reserves against their paid-up capital as well as against their deposits; but very soon the speculative interest thought it desirable to relieve that sum represented by the paid-up capital of the burden of carrying the reserve. Then, again, they thought they could relax the stringency of the reserve provision by counting the redemption fund of 5 per cent against the circulation as a part of the reserve. Then, again, they thought they could relax it a little more by counting clearing-house certificates as a part of the reserves.

None of that legislation should have been enacted. They should not be allowed to count the 5 per cent redemption fund as a part of the reserves, because, under no condition that may arise, can it be made available as a reserve for the purposes for which a reserve fund is required to be carried.

They should not be allowed to count clearing-house certificates as a part of the reserves, because if they were to use them for the purposes for which a reserve fund is to be used, then they would be compelled to make good their credit in the clearing house at the expense of the same fund that they are swelling. They would be taking money out of one pocket and putting it in the other—shifting their change from one hand to the other.

What the business stability of the country needs and demands is certainty in the volume of money, certainty in the value of money, and certainty in the law under which it is distributed. With those three elements of finance carefully kept in view there will be no panics. There has never been a panic that did not originate from the tilting of the table, the shifting of the money of the country beyond its lawful bounds, the concentration of the money of the country into centers and into combinations that make it unavailable to those to whom it belongs and to whom the right to use it belongs.

Mr. President, I would not have occupied so much of the time of the Senate in explaining or presenting this amendment were it not that I deem it absolutely essential that some legislation of this kind, represented by the amendment which I have offered, be enacted now as a part of this bill. There is not another provision in this bill remaining to-day that is of any value to the country. There is no condition existing to-day that demands legislation providing for the issuance of an emergency currency. As I said on a former occasion, in speaking upon this question, we are only offering a temptation to speculate. We say, "Go ahead, jump into deep water, and we will provide the means of getting you out," and just as surely as you provide them the means of escape they will run into the danger.

Mr. President, I do not know that the committee having this bill in charge will give any favorable consideration whatever to this amendment, because my impression is that the committee is not in favor of retaining the reserves as provided by this amendment; but I can not let this bill go out to the country, if it is to go out, or go out of this Chamber with its approval, without presenting this question of the lawful money reserves and the absolute necessity for maintaining their integrity as real reserves as contradistinguished from the phantom and fiction that is to-day called the lawful money reserve of the national banks.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, there is a great variety of reasons why the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] should not be adopted. I will only take the time of the Senate for a few moments in calling attention to two of them, which, in my judgment, are indicative of the character of the amendment as a whole.

In the first place, the Senator from Idaho proposes to reduce the reserves in the banks in the central reserve cities, St. Louis, New York, and Chicago, from 25 to 15 per cent. Such legislation would be extremely unwise.

In the next place, the Senator from Idaho proposes that the reserves in the banks shall be in lawful money of the United States, and in nothing else. "Lawful money of the United States" is gold coin, silver dollars, and legal-tender notes. The national banks held at the last report $300,000,000 of these, and, if the Senator is correct in his statement that $900,000,000 are required, he would have to take out of circulation or find somewhere $600,000,000 of gold coin, silver dollars, and legal-tender notes, which are not in existence now or are in use for other purposes, and put them into the banks of the country.

I think those two statements are sufficient to convince the Senate that the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I can not allow that statement to go unchallenged. There are approximately four thousand million dollars in actual money in the United States—lawful money.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is within a thousand million dollars of the correct amount.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the fluctuating figures, and have them from the same source as has the Senator from Rhode Island. When I say four thousand millions, I am, according to some estimates, below the real amount, and, according to others, above it. It is near enough, however, for the purpose of demonstrating what I propose to say briefly.

Mr. President, I had intended to include national-bank notes in this amendment as a part of the available money for reserves. It is charged that to do so would be to favor a process of possible inflation that would be dangerous and unwise. Therefore, there being less than three quarters of a billion dollars of that class of money—national-bank notes—I concluded to include in the amendment only lawful money of the United States of which we have in existence and in circulation, according to the last official statement of the Treasury, more than twice enough to meet the requirements of 15 per cent reserves, as provided in this amendment.

I have not failed to take into consideration the volume of money in determining in my judgment the wisdom of this proposed legislation. We have as free money in this country over and above the amount that would be required for the lawful money reserves under the provisions of this amendment more than two thousand million dollars in circulation.

It has always been true that when it was proposed to create a safeguard for the real owners of the money deposited in the banks, that these technical objections would be raised in the interest of throwing all the money into the speculative caldron. We have always been met with that proposition. Is there nothing but speculation to be taken into consideration in determining a great question of this kind? The restful prosperity and wealth of the people is of the first importance. It is only a very small proportion of the people that are engaged in or interested in speculation, or in business of a speculative character. The people of the United States carry in their pockets at all times, at every hour of the day or night—in their pockets and tills—more than a thousand million dollars that goes into no bank, that is in the immediate custody of the individuals of the country. Those figures are approved by all financial statisticians and writers in this country. The amount is often fixed in excess of a billion dollars. It is safely that much.

On the basis of three billion dollars, or three thousand millions, more correctly speaking, there is still, after tying up, as you call it, all these reserves and deducting the cash in the pockets of the people, another thousand million of dollars free money with which to do business, making four thousand million dollars that the country has in actual cash. It does a business through its banks representing a credit of four dollars for every one in cash. The credit of the individual and the credit of the people, as a whole, is money just as much as coin is, and, with safe laws to protect the swinging of the financial balance to unhealthy business centers, there is no occasion for panics.

The people know how much coin is behind the credit. They are not ignorant of it. So that there is no danger in these facts being taken openly into consideration. They are proud of the fact that their dollar in cash represents a business capacity of $4, or any other number of dollars that the conditions are able to give it. Remove the conditions that arise from the congestion of the finances of the country in the centers and the people will be financially placid and their business will go on without these disturbances. Do not fear that there will not be money enough and to spare for this special fund of depositors, and do not fear that the speculating element of the country will not be able to readily adjust itself to do business on the balance which is left to them.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, just a moment, to submit certain statistics upon this subject. I have before me the circulation statement of March 2, 1908, showing the total amount of money in circulation at that time in the United States to be $3,092,666,641. I also have before me the last report of the condition of national banks, showing that at that time all the banks in the United States had $148,670,869 in gold coin in their vaults, $17,535,178 in silver dollars, and $174,010,707 of legal tender notes, these descriptions including all the forms of lawful money in the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have prepared and will submit at the proper time an amendment with reference to the reserves to be kept in the vaults of the banks. I am in favor of a strong measure upon that phase of this question. I can not, however, support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], because of the reduction of the amount of the reserve in reserve banks from 25 to 15 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have a vote on that amendment. I may be the only one to vote for it, but I think I should like to know how the Senate stands on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], but I understand that he would vote "nay" if he were present. Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I do not see him in his seat. I do not know how he would vote on this question, but if he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. WARNER (when Mr. STONE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. STONE] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], but by arrangement I transfer that pair to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] so that the Senator from Minnesota will stand paired with the Senator from Mississippi, and I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. In pursuance of the transfer suggested by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I am released from my pair, and I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAY. I announce that my colleague [Mr. BACON] is absent from the Senate by order of the Senate, attending the funeral of the late Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay." He is paired with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. BRIGGS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. When I voted I did not notice that he was not in the Chamber. I do not know how that Senator would vote if he were present, and therefore desire to withdraw my vote, and be recorded as being paired with the Senator from Maryland.

The result was announced—yeas 2, nays 58, as follows:

So Mr. HEYBURN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NELSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in as an additional section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. That sections 5192 and 5195 of the Revised Statutes, as heretofore amended, are hereby repealed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire briefly to explain the nature of that amendment. Those two sections of the Revised Statutes relate to the matter of giving national banks credit for their reserves in deposits they make in other banks; in other words, so-called "country banks" are required to keep a reserve of 15 per cent of their deposits, and three-fifths of that 15 per cent they may deposit and receive credit for as though they had it in their own vaults, in the banks of central reserve cities, or the banks in the reserve cities. The latter are required to keep a reserve of 25 per cent of their deposits, one-half of which they may deposit in central reserve cities. For instance, a country bank, like one in my own home town of Alexandria, is required to keep 15 per cent as a reserve of its deposits. It can deposit three-fifths of that amount, either in the banks of the reserve cities or in the banks of the central reserve cities, and get credit for it as though it was in its own vaults. Now, the banks of St. Paul and Minneapolis, which are banks in reserve cities, of which I think there are about forty in the country, are required to keep a reserve of 25 per cent of their deposits, one-half of which they can deposit in the central reserve cities, to wit, New York, Chicago, and St. Louis.

The recent panic disclosed, if it disclosed anything at all, the great danger that there is in the existing law. The storm center of the panic, as you all know, was in New York City. When the banks of New York concluded to stop payment as they did on the 26th or 28th of last October—I am not sure as to the date—and to resort to clearing-house certificates, they tied up all the reserves of the forty central reserve cities and all the reserves of the country banks. It is true that during that period to a certain extent they took care of drafts and checks drawn on them from distant banks, but neither the country banks nor the banks in the forty reserve cities could during that suspension draw upon these reserves.

That, to my mind, is what caused the great stringency in the Northwest. I think if the reserves of the banks of the city of Chicago, for instance, had not been tied up in New York as they were, Chicago would not have suspended, and I am quite confident what we call the Twin City banks, the banks of St. Paul and Minneapolis, as well as those of Duluth, would never have suspended—they did partially—if their reserves had not been tied up in New York.

I do not intend to weary the Senate with any long speech on this subject, but I want to call the attention of Senators to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. I call attention to the last part of his report, found on pages 69 and 70, as bearing on this important question, and I ask that the Secretary may read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The chief weakness of our present national banking system is the provision in regard to reserve deposits, which piles reserve on reserve, in reserve cities and central reserve cities, without requiring a sufficient amount of actual cash reserve on hand. As we have seen in the present crisis, when a real emergency arises these reserves are not reserves at all, because they may in a day become unavailable.

It will be an improvement to add to the proportion of reserve to be held in cash by the country banks and the reserve city banks, but the proper solution of the difficulty is to increase the amount to be held in cash by all the banks and require all the reserve deposits to be kept with a central bank organized for that purpose. The increase in cash reserves from 6 to 10 or even 15 per cent in the country banks would not help a bank very much when it had any large demand for its deposits. What such a bank needs is a safe reserve in cash and a further reserve with a bank where it is surely available, at any time, in currency. This would be the case with reserve deposits in a central bank. Further than this, the depositing bank could be sure that at any time, as long as it was solvent, it could go to the central bank and get any amount of cash needed on the notes of its customers or other good security. With such a bank to depend on, no solvent bank need ever have any fear of its ability to meet all demands.

The present banking law prescribes a minimum reserve on deposits in central reserve cities—New York, Chicago, and St. Louis—of 25 per cent, all of which must be in the vaults of the bank in lawful money. The reserve cities are required to keep 25 per cent reserve, one-half of which may be on deposit in the central reserve cities. Banks in all other cities are required to keep 15 per cent of reserve, of which three-fifths may be on deposit with reserve or central reserve cities, all three classes of banks being given credit for their 5 per cent redemption fund as reserve. Whenever there is a disturbance among the banks and any impairment of confidence, this system is always a source of weakness instead of strength. This is what may make a panic among the banks before there is even any decided uneasiness among their depositors. The banks realize upon what a small margin they depend, and each one, in self-defense, is compelled not only to collect its loans, but withdraw its deposit reserves.

Under this reserve system deposits of $10,000,000 in country or nonreserve city banks would call for a cash reserve to be kept in their vaults of but $600,000. They could carry and count as reserve $900,000 on deposit with reserve city banks. These reserve city banks would be required to have in their vaults cash to the amount of only $112,500, and might deposit $112,500 in central reserve cities, who, in turn, would have to have on hand 25 per cent, or but $28,125 in cash.

To recapitulate this in the form of a table:

Cash reserve on deposits of $10,000,000.

	Amount of deposits.	Cash reserve in vaults.	Deposited with reserve agents.	Possible loans.
Country banks	$10,000,000	$600,000	$900,000	$8,500,000
Reserve city banks (amount above deposited by country banks)	900,000	112,500	112,500	675,000
Central reserve city banks (amount as above deposited by reserve city banks)	112,500	28,125	----------	84,375
Total	11,012,500	740,625	1,012,500	9,259,375
Per cent of total deposits	----------	6⅔	9⅛	84
Per cent of original deposit	----------	7⅜	10⅛	92½

Amount of cash outside original country banks, $140,625, or 1.4 per cent.

It will thus be seen that the country bank keeps but 6 per cent on hand in cash, and of the country bank's reserve deposits the city banks keep but 1.4 per cent on hand in cash. There is therefore but 7.4 per cent of cash, or $740,625, kept unloaned anywhere against this deposit of $10,000,000 in the country banks. Of this but $140,625 is outside the country bank's own vaults. If, therefore, there is a reduction in the deposits of the country banks of $150,000 out of $10,000,000, or only 1½ per cent, it calls for more cash or reserve money than has been kept on hand for the whole $10,000,000 in the reserve banks.

Is it any wonder, then, that the demand in the fall for about $200,000,000 in currency for crop moving always makes a disturbance and that when this demand was accompanied by withdrawal of deposits and a curtailment of credits, caused by uneasiness and distrust, that the banks were forced in self-defense to partially suspend payments, adopt clearing-house certificates, and various other expedients to furnish currency to meet such an emergency? The surprising thing is not that there has been such a disturbance of credit and business, but that the situation has been met as well as it has. It speaks volumes for the credit of the banks that they have done as well as they have, and shows the confidence of the people in their ultimate solvency and strength.

Mr. NELSON. I want to supplement that with a further explanation, that the repeal of these two sections in no manner interferes with the right of the banks to deposit their money wherever they may see fit. They can make deposits in other banks the same as before. The only difference is that they can not get credit for the deposit they make in these other banks as a part of the reserves they are required to keep for the protection of the depositors.

Mr. President, we want those reserves to be available and not to be a mere sham. In contingencies such as the recent panic, those reserves proved a snare and a delusion to the depositor. Take a country bank, with deposits of, say, a hundred thousand dollars. It is required to keep $15,000 in reserve for the protection of its depositors. It can deposit $9,000 of that $15,000 in one of the banks of the reserve cities, or central reserve cities, and then from the remainder it is entitled to deduct the money deposited in the Treasury Department as a fund for the protection of its circulation; in other words, the 5 per cent fund. So that from the $6,000, or from the two-fifths that is retained by the bank, there is still deducted the 5 per cent on the circulation.

Now, as I said in my remarks the other day on this subject, the system of bank reserves is a perfect lock-stitch system. There never has been a system contrived which has led to more speculation. Under this system the country banks and the banks in the reserve cities pile their money into New York City, and they pile it in there for the sake of getting this small pittance of 2 per cent interest. Those big banks in New York City get that great volume of money from the country banks and from the banks in the reserve cities. What do they do with it? That money is principally invested in these speculative call loans, and when we get a stringency and panic, such as we had in October, that money is tied up, and it is a snare and a delusion and no protection to the depositor.

Mr. President, to my mind, if we want to deal honestly with the American people, if we want to deal honestly with the depositors in our national banks, we ought to keep this fund that we call a "reserve fund" for the protection of the depositors in shape where it can at all times be available for the protection of the depositors. The result of this system—and it is a cunningly contrived system—is, on the one hand, to lead to great speculation in Wall street when the money is piled up there, and, on the other hand, in the case of panic to have the reserve money of the national banks tied up, as it was in the recent panic.

When the Finance Committee reported this bill, if I remember aright, and if I am mistaken the Senator from Rhode Island will correct me, there was a little paragraph in it diminishing the amount of the credit that country banks could receive; I think a reduction to one-half. I may be mistaken, but I think there was a little clause. But finally when the bill was reported to the Senate there was nothing at all on the subject in the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Minnesota will remember that when I reported for the committee a few days ago certain amendments, in answer to his own question I stated that the committee had under consideration some amendments to the reserve provisions of the law, and they would report them at a later day.

Mr. NELSON. Nothing has appeared or has been offered here in the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am inclined to think the committee will report an amendment to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON. I am aware of the fact that all legislation is in the nature of a compromise, and that none of us can get a measure exactly as we want it, or as we picture to ourselves it ought to be. If the committee would make some reasonable provision to cure this evil, if they would make a change in the amount of the reserve of the country banks and also in the amount of the reserves of the banks in the reserve cities—if the committee would bring in a reasonable amendment, I should not undertake to press this amendment. But in the absence of that I shall ask for a vote on this amendment. I want to be as generous to the Senator from Rhode Island in this instance as he was a moment ago. I am willing, if that is satisfactory, that this amendment shall lie on the table until to-morrow, and we can then take a vote upon it, and meanwhile give the committee an opportunity to see what they will bring in to cure this evil.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to make a few remarks on the nature of this amendment, if the Senator from Minnesota is through.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am quite willing to let it go over, if the Senator prefers, but I think the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension as to what would be the effect of this amendment if adopted. The Senator from Texas has a similar amendment, but I hope to show to both the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Minnesota, when the matter is up, that these amendments would be absolutely destructive to the business of this country; and they, I believe, after hearing a statement as to the practical effects will certainly not press them to a vote.

I am quite willing to say to the Senator that I expect to report from the committee to-morrow morning an amendment upon the matter of reserves. I am not sure, of course, whether it will be satisfactory to that Senator or not. I think some legislation ought to be had upon the question of the reserves. But it is a very important question. Every Senator must realize that. The question of banking reserves is a very complicated one, affecting not only the banks but the people of this country as to their loans, because a reduction of the reserves affects immediately the loaning power of the banks, and therefore we ought to treat it with the most careful consideration. I hope that we will be able to report an amendment which for the present anyhow will satisfy the Senator from Minnesota. We can not, in this bill, dispose of all the complex questions affecting the banking interests of this country. I hope later on the committee will take up this question and present some scheme of amendments and reforms to the banking system and the currency system that will be satisfactory to the Senate. I am quite willing that the vote upon this amendment shall be postponed until to-morrow, and I will defer any criticism which I have to make until that time.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. Upon the exhaustion of the securities accepted by the officer, or officers, of the Government for the indemnifying of the Government for the issuance of bank notes to any banking association, if sufficient is not realized therefrom to indemnify the Government, the Government shall be subordinated to the lawful claims of all other creditors of the bank in the distribution of the other assets of the bank.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, as long as the security that is given to the Government for the loan of the money to the banks is in the shape of United States bonds, there can be no question about its being sufficient to redeem all the bank notes for which the Government is liable; but if issuance to banks is made upon State or county bonds or other bonds than bonds of the United States, then it may be that they will not be sufficient to indemnify the Government for the amount paid by the Government for the redemption of the bank notes. If thereupon the Government can look to the deposits, it is going to make it that much more dangerous for a man to deposit his money in a national bank and to cripple the bank's business to that extent. I think if the Government carves out its security for the issuance of bank notes, it ought to be satisfied when that is exhausted to wait until the depositors in the bank shall have an opportunity to secure their deposits and their credits of the bank.

It would be a dangerous thing, in my judgment, to make any provision whereby the money of depositors should go to the settlement of the claim that the bank owed to the Government. If I am tempted to deposit my money in a bank, providing I had any money, and I know that that money is liable for the bank's indebtedness to the United States Government, it to that extent deters me from depositing in a national bank and encourages me to deposit in a State bank. I would not do anything to cripple the State banks. I would do everything in the world I could to put them upon a perfect equality with national banks. Neither would I, on the other hand, cripple the national banks by making it dangerous to deposit money with them.

Whether the language of the amendment will accomplish the purpose to be attained I am not prepared to say, but some amendment of this kind ought to be adopted to the pending bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask for the rereading of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. Upon the exhaustion of the securities accepted by the officer, or officers, of the Government for the indemnifying of the Government for the issuance of bank notes to any banking association, if sufficient is not realized therefrom to indemnify the Government, the Government shall be subordinated to the lawful claims of all other creditors of the bank in the distribution of the other assets of the bank.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator who introduced the amendment why would not the same object be attained by simply striking out of the bill the provisions for the priority of the Government's lien?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not in this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is one in this bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; it is in the general law.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think the same purpose would be accomplished if that were done, for the reason that in that event, after the Government shall have exhausted all of its securities against the bank, it would then have the right to enjoy in the collection of the balance of its debt a pro rata of the deposits of the depositors, and I do not think that ought to be done. I think when the Government goes security for the bank to the extent of the bank notes issued by the Government in the name of the bank, it ought to be satisfied with that, and the depositors ought to have the assets that come from their deposits for the security of their claims until after they are secured and liquidated, and then the Government can pursue its lien upon the balance of the assets, if there be such.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me understand this bill. It provides for the issuance of an emergency currency, that currency to be based upon certain Government and municipal bonds that are to be deposited with the Government as security for the issue. Now, either under the general law or under the provisions of this bill, the Government is given a prior lien upon all the assets of that bank for the purpose of securing this emergency issue. Am I correct upon that proposition?

Mr. McLAURIN. For the purpose of securing the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Against loss.

Mr. McCUMBER. Against loss upon this emergency issue.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is this security provision in the bill itself, or is it under the provisions of the law as it now exists?

Mr. McLAURIN. I am not prepared to say whether it is in the bill itself or whether it is in the law as it now exists.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is in the general law.

Mr. McLAURIN. But the Senator from Rhode Island, in charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee, in presenting this bill stated that as a security the Government has a prior lien on all the assets of the bank. So the Government can not lose anything. It were better, it seems to me, for the Government to lose that, if the Government is derelict in the taking of securities, than for the depositors to lose it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The law is changed at least to this effect. We have a provision for a new currency issue, amounting in the aggregate to $500,000,000. Therefore, to the extent of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, there is created another incumbrance upon the banks of the country, which is superior to the lien of the depositors upon the assets of the banks. It seems to me that the Government is absolutely secured; that there is no necessity whatever for diminishing to any extent the security of the depositor. The Government says what it will accept and what it will not accept in the matter of bonds. The Government declares that it will allow an issue of only 90 per cent of the face value of those securities. The Government, therefore, having absolute control not only as to the amount of the issue that will be given upon the securities which it accepts, but having in its own power the determination of what securities it will accept, and in addition to that having, through the taxing power, the ability to force out of the property of any municipality every dollar of its indebtedness sooner or later, the Government can not possibly lose one cent if it is disposed to enforce its lien.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am speaking right along the line of the Senator's amendment, and I assure the Senator I am in absolute sympathy with what he desires to secure in this legislation. I am going to vote for it, and I am now giving my reasons for so doing.

We ought not under any circumstances to place a greater burden upon the depositor. I myself am in favor of absolutely protecting the depositor by the levying of such a charge against the average amount of deposits in any bank as will create a fund sufficient to ultimately protect every one of them. While the Senator may not agree with me in going to that extent, I agree with him absolutely in going to the extent of saying that at least the present status of depositors shall not be impaired in any respect whatever, so that they will be in a worse condition after this bill shall have passed than they were before. In other words, the Government can take the bonds of a municipality that are absolutely good. If the bank which has issued its emergency currency upon the bonds of that municipality fails, then the Government does not proceed to collect its debt in the ordinary method, by enforcing it in a judgment; but, as I understand the bill, the securities have to be sold. Therefore, if they are to be sold, they will be sold at a time when there is a stringency of money, necessarily, and they may be sold for considerably less than their usual market value. So I can see that under that system there might be a loss. It seems to me there ought to be a provision in this bill so that the Government, instead of selling the securities at a discount, should not sell them at less than the amount of the issue based upon them.

But if it can not realize that amount, then it ought to have the authority to proceed to put in judgment and collect in the ordinary methods the amount due upon that bond. In that manner it will be absolutely secure, and under that system there will be no necessity whatever of impairing the obligation which the bank makes to its depositor that it will pay in full the amount of the deposit.

So it seems to me that the amendment of the Senator is very correct indeed; that we ought to take some steps to protect the depositors; and that we ought not to give the Government, which has it in its power to collect every cent, to take the balance of the man who has nothing but the assets to fall back upon, and after selecting the securities which you yourself determined to be absolutely correct and sufficient say that you can take away from the depositor his security against the other assets of the bank. It appears to me that that is treating the depositor unjustly. It invites the very thing that this bill is intended to cure. It invites dissatisfaction and fear of the solvency of the bank and of the ability of the depositor to get the full amount of the sum that he has deposited.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, Senators have used terms as interchangeable. Under the act of 1797 they speak of the Government as having a lien upon the fund. It has no lien upon the fund at all. The act does not give the Government a prior lien. It gives it the right of payment.

Mr. ALDRICH. The national-bank act gives the Government a prior lien in the terms of the act of 1797.

Mr. HEYBURN. The term "lien" is not applicable in this case. The right to prior payment is not necessarily a lien, because if it were a lien it would pass to an assignee subject to the lien. But if it is a right of prior payment it is a right of prior payment by the assignee, and it would be defeated by an absolute transfer of the property before the assignment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think perhaps the Senator had better read the section.

Mr. McLAURIN. Before that is done I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I wish to say that the same effect would result from the prior payment or from the enforcement of the lien. It does not make any difference what it is, if the Government has the right to prior payment out of the fund realized from the deposits of the depositors, it will to that extent deter men from depositing in national banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. It might be just as profitable to straighten this out while we are about it as anything we could engage ourselves in at this time. The section of the national-bank act to which my attention is called is said to supersede the provision in the act of 1797.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not say that, if the Senator refers to what I said.

Mr. HEYBURN. I got that impression from what the Senator from Rhode Island said.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said there was no specific provision in the national-bank act for the prior lien of the United States. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to say the other day that, whether that statute had been in existence or not, under the act of 1797 the United States would have had a prior lien.

Mr. HEYBURN. Nevertheless, the suggestion that I made is applicable. There is all the difference in the world between a lien and a right that may ripen into a lien. I will read the section of the national-bank act, that it may appear in the RECORD for convenience.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator one question. After a bank has become insolvent and is placed in the hands of a receiver, with such assets as it then owns, what is the difference in legal effect whether you say the Government has a prior right to payment out of the assets, or whether you say that the Government has a prior lien upon the assets? Is it not practically the same thing?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us see whether it is or not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I mean after the bank has gone into insolvency. I use the word "lien" in its general sense, and in considering its effect upon the property of the bank after the bank has gone into the Government's hands, the Government taking possession of it, and not as indicating a specific lien upon specific property, which would continue not only while the bank was doing business, but which would continue until payment was made. I did not use it at all in that sense.

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems to me that it is a little more important to consider the thing upon which the lien was made; that is, to consider the question as to what constitutes the assets at a given time. If the bank had gone into bankruptcy because of having transferred all its property, the right of the Government would not attach, because the property that had been transferred would not be an asset of the bank. So that is the crucial point on which a number of the cases have turned, where the court was considering the effect of this class of legislation.

Of course, the national-bank act added nothing to the strength of the act of March 3, 1797. That act had been construed frequently by the court in the very earliest days of the Government. Finally, the Supreme Court concluded that its decisions needed some explanation, and they undertook to straighten them out. They drew some conclusions that did not appear upon the face of any prior decision, and I have had occasion to consider them. I will just take the liberty of calling attention to the ultimate analysis of this question of a lien and the assets to which the lien applies and to which it does not apply by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a very long case. My recollection is——

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will pardon me, there is no case holding that under any circumstances the Government has a lien on any of the property until there has been a failure of the bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the question is what the lien is upon.

Mr. KNOX. It is not a lien; it is a preference to the assets and mortgage.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to read a few lines from this very long decision. I shall read only a few lines from it for the purpose of showing the distinction which the court draws between a lien and a preference in payment.

Of course, if the Government had a lien the property would pass to the assignee, subject to the lien, but if the property passes to the assignee, the Government has merely a preferential right of payment out of the proceeds. That is the test of the law, and it goes to the very amendment that is now under consideration the way it is drawn. The court says in brief in considering the act of March 3, 1797:

> Then, again, it is contended on behalf of the United States that the priority thus created by law, if it be not of itself a lien, is still superior to any lien, and even to an actual mortgage on the personal property of the debtor.

The court says:

> It is admitted that where any absolute conveyance is made the property passes so as to defeat the priority—

Of the United States. It defeats the priority—

> but it is said that a lien has been decided to have no such effect; and that in the eye of a court of equity a mortgage is but a lien for a debt. Thelluson v. Smith (2 Wheat., 396).

That was one of the cases referred to. That case—has been mainly relied on in support of this doctrine. That case has been greatly misunderstood at the bar and will require a particular explanation. But the language of the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in that case is conclusive on the point of a mortgage. "The United States," said he, "are to be first satisfied; but, then, it must be out of the debtor's estate. If, therefore, before the right of preference has accrued to the United States the debtor has made a bona fide conveyance of his estate to a third person, or has mortgaged the same to secure a debt—or his property has been seized under a fieri facias—the property is divested out of the debtor and can not be made liable to the United States."

Conrad v. The Atlantic Insurance Company (1 Peters Reports, p. 440).

I pause here to say that is the position in which most national banks are at the time when, if the Government is to have the right suggested by the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, that right will attach, so that you would not have as efficient a protection as it might seem upon the face of things to be, nor would the provision in the national-bank act be effective to protect the credit of the currency or circulation that had been issued upon the bonds which had proven an insufficient basis for such circulation, leaving an uncovered balance for the Government to take care of.

The provision of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, which undertakes in terms to give the depositors a preferential right as against the Government for the uncovered balance that may be due after the securities have been disposed of and applied to the satisfaction of the circulation, is to give the creditors just what they would have now if there was an assignment before the Government asserted its right, or if the bank had done what they generally do, transferred and disposed of their securities; in other words, if it would go bankrupt, and come to the Government without assets. That would give the depositors all of that fund, whatever it might be, fifty cents on the dollar, or ten, or seventy-five. The Government would get nothing out of that fund under the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississsippi.

I think it would be better to leave the law just as it is and let the Government, instead of having a lien upon the assets of the bank, participate in the distribution as a preferred creditor of whatever fund might remain after the affairs of the bank were liquidated.

Now, this law has not been changed. The decision has been, without modification, the true rule in regard to the act of 1797. There are, perhaps, a dozen or more cases prior to this particular case. The cases, if I remember, though I have not read the body of the decisions for some time, were originally tried by a jury before Justice Washington in the circuit court for the district of Pennsylvania. All this controversy, which resulted in one of the most notable cases of that day, arose out of that trial, but it decided some of the most important questions as to the relative rights of the Government of the United States as a preferred creditor that have ever been raised in the courts, and of most far-reaching importance.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator why the depositor should not have a preference right over the general assets of a bank as long as you give the Government the exclusive right to make its losses good out of the very bonds that it has accepted. The Government can accept bonds that are absolutely good. The bill is drawn with considerable care to secure the Government against the acceptance of any municipal bond that is not absolutely good; and a bond that is legal must necessarily be good if there is property enough in the municipality to pay it. Therefore the Government is protected absolutely unless it sells for less than the value, and there is no excuse whatever for the Government to sell those bonds for less than the 90 per cent of the face value, which would cover the amount of the issue upon it.

So far as those bonds are concerned, the Government does have a lien on them. It has the lien of a pledgee.

Mr. HEYBURN. A conveyance of title.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, in our State it would be called a lien. Under some jurisdictions it would be considered as conveying the legal title. It holds a position, however, as a pledgee. The property is in its possession and in its name, and it is protected.

If there is ever any loss, the Government can well afford to lose that little loss rather than to shoulder it upon the poor depositor who has nothing whatever except the assets of the bank to fall back upon. The Government is better able than an individual to suffer a loss; it is always able to protect itself, and I am not in favor of the Government taking the property into its hands and paying itself first and then turning over to the depositor what may be left. There is a moral obligation on the part of the Government to protect the depositor first, because the Government has control over the bank. It is a quasi-public institution. It is created by the Government itself, and the Government to a great extent conducts that bank. It sends its special agents there; it looks over its manner of conducting its business; it gives its advice; it enforces its rules and regulations, and if properly enforced no bank scarcely could ever go into bankruptcy.

Giving the Government all of that control, it does seem to me that the Government is not in a position to say to the depositor, "We will protect ourselves first, and if there is anything left you can take it." Morally it ought to say exactly the other way, inasmuch as we ourselves determine what is security. We should be satisfied to stand upon that security and give to the depositor a preference to any other assets of the bank out of which to make good his losses. Morally, I say, we should stand upon that broad proposition.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything more on the amendment, and would not have done so but for the fact that the Senator from Idaho has read authority to establish a proposition which does not argue anything against the position taken in favor of the amendment. It does not make any difference whether you call the Government right a lien or a right that may ripen into a lien or a right to prior payment—it does not make any difference what you call it—the result is the same. The Government accepts $100,000 of State bonds or municipal bonds, and upon that issues $90,000 of bank notes to a banking association. That banking association receives deposits, and after a while becomes involved and is by the Comptroller of the Currency put into liquidation.

Now, when the Government exhausts that $100,000 of bonds, State or municipal, whatever they are, in order to indemnify itself for the $90,000 it has to pay for the bank notes that it has guaranteed, then it ought to be willing to rest on that until the depositors are paid out of the deposits which they have placed in the bank.

The money that is in the bank outside of the $100,000 is money that is put there by the depositors. Its assets are made up of the loan of the depositors. For the Government to say that it will take the deposits in order to get the $10,000 or the $5,000 or the $15,000 or whatever may be left due the Government when it has sold the $100,000 of State or municipal bonds, is to say that it will take out of the deposits of the depositors this amount of money to pay the debt of the bank to the Government. That is not just; it is not honest; it is not morally right, and it ought not to be made legally right. Now, that is the moral side of the question.

Then, there is another side of it. You cripple the banks when you say to a depositor, "If you put your money there and if the Government has not taken security sufficient to indemnify itself for guaranteeing the notes of the bank we are going to take that money, or the assets that are derived from that money, and pay the balance that is due to the Government in order to indemnify it." I say you cripple the bank because we are not going to deposit in a national bank in preference to a State bank when that money might be taken to pay the debt of the bank to the Government.

If the bill is to go through without some provision of this kind, it had better be denominated "a bill to demoralize depositors in national banks" than "a bill to amend the national banking laws." As I said in the outset, as long as the guaranty of the Government was composed of United States bonds there could be no apprehension on the part of the depositor, because he knew that in the very nature of things the Government bond is bound to pay the Government guaranty and he is to have no apprehension in depositing his money in national banks; but he will be apprehensive if you let this go out and let it be understood that in time of panic these bonds can be sold and if they do not realize 90 per cent of their face value the balance can be made up by the deposits of the depositors.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. Would the people draw money out of the banks in your State or would they feel secure provided they had the bonds of your State as security for that money?

Mr. McLAURIN. It is not a question whether they would feel secure if they had the bonds of my State or the bonds of the State of the Senator from California. You may take the bonds of the State of California and you could not realize 50 per cent on them during the last panic, nor on the bonds of any other State in the Union. The money was not there upon which you could realize.

Mr. FLINT. You could not only realize 50 per cent but you could realize more than par upon them at any time during the panic.

Mr. McLAURIN. You could not realize on United States bonds, because during the panic the money was not in circulation. Men could not get money; and that is what made the panic.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator simply is not informed when he says that the bonds of the United States were less than par during the panic. There never was a time when United States bonds were as high as right during the middle of the panic. They were never in greater demand.

Mr. McLAURIN. When a panic comes there is no money that is to be given out upon anything. The banks of New York would not let the money out that belonged to the depositors in the country banks. But, Mr. President, it is not a question whether the people of Mississippi——

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will yield to the Senator from Rhode Island in a moment. I invite the attention of the Senator from California to what I am about to say. It is not a question whether the people of Mississippi would feel safe in the bonds of Mississippi, but I will say to the Senator that the bonds of Mississippi are at a premium and they are as good as the bonds of California or any other State in the Union.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator a question right there. Do I understand him to make the statement that during the panic the bonds of the State of Mississippi were selling for less than par, or that they were selling for 50 cents on the dollar?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not say they were selling at all. There were no other bonds selling at all during that time. But let me finish with one Senator at a time. I will yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. My suggestion was pertinent just at that point, it seemed to me. I remember hearing the Senator declaim most eloquently upon the fact that in Mississippi the banks paid during the panic and there was no suspension there.

Mr. McLAURIN. The Senator is mistaken. He never heard me say that.

Mr. ALDRICH. In his own town?

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes; I said the bank of my town did, but not in the whole State. It is not so much a question whether the people of Mississippi would be satisfied with bonds of Mississippi, because the people there know the bonds are good and at a premium; but bank notes circulate in Mississippi as they do in California, where they are issued upon bonds and will be issued upon bonds of other States than Mississippi or California. Bank notes will circulate in California that are issued to banks in the State of Mississippi, and, vice versa, bank notes will circulate in Mississippi that are issued to banks in California. They know nothing about the condition of bonds. They know that if they are United States bonds those United States bonds are bound to be good for the indemnity, because if the bank owes the United States and they hold the United States bonds they can offset one against the other. But when a man goes to deposit his money he is not going to see the kind of State bonds upon which the bank notes are issued.

He is not going to inquire whether those bank notes are issued upon State bonds or upon other bonds. He wants to deposit his money in a bank where there is no question about its security. He does not want to deposit his money in a bank where, if the bonds placed for the security of the Government and for the indemnity of the Government are not sufficient, its deposits can be taken to make it up.

That is the thing I want to call the attention of the Senator from California to that is recognized in this bill. It does not recognize the bonds of the State of California or of any other State in this Union as sufficient to guarantee it dollar for dollar, because it can only issue 90 per cent upon the bonds of the best State in the Union, if there is any State better than any other State. The bill recognizes the fact that it can be issued for less than the par value of any bond of any State.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. Does the Senator from Mississippi know of any State in this Union, or of any municipality of any standing in this Union, whose bonds are selling for less than 90 cents on the dollar?

Mr. McLAURIN. Then, if that be true, Mr. President, and they are taken upon State bonds, there can be no harm in this amendment, because the Government never, in the very nature of the case, can lose. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] in presenting this bill went on to show how the Government is protected; how the money is good because it is guaranteed by the Government of the United States, and it is protected because if the Government sale of these bonds does not realize sufficient to indemnify the Government, then there is a lien upon the assets of the bank.

I will say to the Senator from California that there is another thing about that. This does not rely entirely upon a State bond, but it is intended to be predicated upon State, municipal, and county bonds.

Mr. FLINT. I have included in my statement the proposition of the State and municipal bond, and I will now include county bonds. Does the Senator from Mississippi know of any State, municipal, or county bond in the Union that is selling for 90 cents on the dollar?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not know the value of all the bonds in the country. While I do not know of any which are selling for that, there may be many of them, because I do not pretend to have any knowledge of the value of bonds—municipal, county, or State. I only know that in my State the State bonds, county bonds, and municipal bonds, so far as I know, are good.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Partially answering the question of the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], does not the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] know that for two months bonds did not sell for anything?

Mr. McLAURIN. That is what I have stated.

Mr. McCUMBER. There were scarcely any sales of bonds being made because there was no money in the country that was available to pay for them.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is what I said, and the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] called me to book for the statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. There was simply a cessation of payments, and if the Government had demanded a sale during that time, when there was no money in the country to be had from the banks, does the Senator think we could have got 90 per cent for such bonds then?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] are entirely mistaken when they state that no bonds could have been sold in the United States during a period of two months, or even ten days. There never was a time, in my opinion, that this class of bonds could not have been sold during the period mentioned for a price far above 90 cents on the dollar, and they could have been sold during the height of the panic at that price.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from California tell me where the money was at that time to pay for those bonds at any price?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Men do not ordinarily carry in their pockets enough money to buy any great amount of bonds; and if you can not get money out of the banks, and if you can not make collections, where will you get your money to make payments?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, at the very time of which the Senator speaks the money was not in the banks. The trouble was that the people had drawn the money out of the banks. It was in the hands of the people, and they were looking for just such investments as buying bonds for less than par.

If under the provisions of this bill municipal bonds are included, municipal bonds will be in just as great demand in a time of panic as United States bonds were during the last panic. If there was anything that was at a premium and in demand it was United States bonds during the last panic, when those bonds could have been used for issuing circulation or for Government deposits.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota for that purpose?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. How did you get United States bonds? How many of those bonds were sold outside of the money that was furnished by the Government itself to make the payments?

In other words, the Government already having about $135,000,000 of deposits in the banks, immediately turned over $60,000,000 more. Then the banks were enabled to take about $50,000,000 out of the $60,000,000 that the Government handed over to them and buy Government bonds. The scheme was then to issue $50,000,000 upon them. I have not heard of any great number of 2 per cent bonds of the United States that were sold in the market during that period, except as they were bought in almost wholly by those banks who had received the Government money for the purpose of purchasing them again. It is very easy for the Government to turn over the money to the banks and then let the banks use $50,000,000 out of the $60,000,000 to buy the bonds back.

Mr. FLINT and Mr. SMITH addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. McLAURIN. I yield to the Senator from California with pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I should like to answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. SMITH. I wish just to make a statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McLAURIN. I will yield to the Senator from Michigan to ask the Senator from California any question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Michigan, if the Senator from Mississippi yields to him.

Mr. McLAURIN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan for a question.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I was simply going to observe that the arguments of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] and of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] seem to have proceeded upon the theory that the Government must sell these securities, whether State or municipal, at a disadvantageous time when, as a matter of fact, it may, under the law, elect its own time. Again, in my judgment—although I am not wholly clear about it—the Government itself may buy in those securities and hold them.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], in answer to his question, that, as a matter of fact, bonds owned by the savings banks throughout the United States at the time of the panic sold at a higher price and there was a greater demand for them than at any period in our history. The bonds that were in the hands of the savings banks and banks other than national banks were loaned at that time for the purpose of having circulation issued, and commanded a premium, as I have stated, as high as at any other time in the history of the United States bond market.

To repeat what I said a moment ago, if this bill should pass, there would be the same demand for municipal bonds, high-class county and State bonds, and they would be in demand because the minute these bonds were acquired the banks could issue money on them under this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from California a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator says that the bonds of the savings banks sold at a premium.

Mr. FLINT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. They sold at a premium to whom?

Mr. FLINT. To the national banks who desired to issue circulation upon them.

Mr. McCUMBER. They were sold at a premium for national banks to issue circulation. How did the national banks get the money to pay for those bonds when they would not pay their individual depositors and the other banks who had deposits with them, if they did not get it from the Government of the United States? In other words, the Government did have the money and the Government loaned the money, or handed the money over to the national banks in order to allow them the opportunity to buy bonds upon which to issue currency, and the national banks, not having the bonds themselves, could utilize a portion of that money and turn it over to the savings banks and get the bonds and issue currency upon them.

But the point that I was trying to get at was whether, outside of the money furnished by the United States to buy bonds, there was a large market for any kind of bonds or other securities during about a month and a half of our financial flurry. I do not understand that there was. If I am correct, just one word further. I am not assuming that the Government of the United States will necessarily sell its bonds at inopportune times. On the contrary, I am assuming—and I think the Senator from Mississippi did the same—that the Government is amply secured and can sell these bonds at the proper time and can realize the full amount of the sum issued upon the bonds. If it can do that, then it ought not to ask for a prior payment of any difference that there may be out of the funds that properly belong to the depositors.

Mr. McLAURIN. Now, Mr. President, so many have gotten up here with questions that I will probably not be able to answer them in their order, but I will refer first to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], to which I saw the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] nodding time and again his assent, that the Government will not sell these bonds at a time when there is a money stringency, but will reserve the State and municipal bonds until there is a time when the full amount that is due by the banks to the Government can be realized. I hope that that will be so in any event; but if it should not, then I should like to have it understood that the Government in the balance of its collections is subordinated to those men who put the assets into the bank out of which the collection is to be made. It is possible that the Government may not realize enough to indemnify itself, or, at least, the Senator from Rhode Island, who is in charge of this bill, thought possibly it might some time happen that the Government would sell these bonds when they would not realize the full amount, because, in enumerating the securities that the Government has to indemnify itself, the bill not only mentions these bonds, but says, in addition, that the Government is to have a lien upon the assets of the banks to indemnify itself.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a fundamental question about this business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that the people of the State of Mississippi desire a currency to be issued by the Government of the United States that is not absolutely safe and amply secured in every way?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, does he think, then, that he is justified in taking away one of the safeguards that has existed in the form of the national-bank act for forty years, and has existed in another form for more than a century?

Mr. McLAURIN. Why, Mr. President, it is not the bond that has made these bank notes good as money, and nobody knows that better than the Senator from Rhode Island. It is the guaranty of the Government that makes them good, and I would not take that away. I do not propose to take that away.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, this preference the Government of the United States has, as I say, existed for more than a century. Every man who makes a deposit in a national bank has understood that. He has made his deposit with notice, and every man who takes the note of a national bank knows that that was one of the safeguards around the security and safety of that note. I am surprised to see the Senator from Mississippi appear here and try to take away one of the safeguards which the public has had, and which the people of his State have enjoyed in common with the people of the other States.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not intend, Mr. President, that the Senator from Rhode Island shall be permitted to throw any such confusion as that around this subject. It is not the bond—and the Senator knows that—that has made the security of these bank notes. Nobody ever looks to the bond that is deposited in the vaults of the Treasury as a guaranty for the payment of these notes. The man who takes national-bank notes to-day in payment of his debt takes them, not because there is a valid security back of them in the form of a bond of the United States, but he takes them because the Government of the United States has guaranteed their payment. I do not propose to take away that guaranty. The Senator knows that, and this amendment would not take that guaranty away.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator is proposing to take away the provision which enables the United States to make good any deficiency on the part of the bank.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is a different proposition.

Mr. ALDRICH. And that, I say, to every intelligent man must form one of the basic securities of the national-bank notes, and every man in the United States understands it if the Senator from Mississippi does not.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I may not have intelligence, and every man in the United States may understand it, but I will venture to say that there are a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber and on the other side who do not understand it as the Senator from Rhode Island does. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has shown that he understands it as I do, and the Senator from Rhode Island, with all the intelligence which he arrogates to himself, must understand that it is not the bond that is back of the bank note, but the guaranty of the Government of the United States that makes it good; and the Senator knows that if bank notes were issued by a bank without the guaranty of the Government, he would question them, and everybody else in the country would question them.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it is the cumulative security which the law now throws around bank notes which causes them to circulate throughout the United States and to be received by all the people of the United States without question. I again express my surprise that the intelligent Senator from Mississippi should endeavor to take away from the people of this country one of the securities which they rely upon.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McLAURIN. In a moment I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

The "cumulative securities!" Where is the accumulation of security that the Government has to give? The Government of the United States does not have to give any security to make its guaranty or its promise good. It is no accumulation of security nor is it cumulative security. It is the guaranty of the Government; it is the promise of the Government to pay that makes it good.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McLAURIN. I have agreed to yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. ALDRICH. Just for one second.

Mr. McLAURIN. One at a time, and they will go further. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. All right. Mr. President, I am old enough to remember—I do not know whether the Senator from Mississippi is or not—a time when the securities of the United States were not at par and when the securities of the State of Mississippi were not accepted in the market places of the country. I hope that that time will never come again; but I say that we should be derelict to our duty to the people of this country if we did not carefully provide against such contingencies as existed once in the State of Mississippi and again throughout the United States.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, when the promises of the Government of the United States in the shape of its promissory notes were not at par, their strength was not helped by the guaranty of the bankers of the country; it was not helped by any deposit of any security by any banker or by anybody else in the country.

As to the State of Mississippi, Mr. President, its guaranties have always been good if they were lawful. The guaranty of the State of Mississippi and its notes have always been good, except for a short period of time when it was in the hands of men who exploited that State during the days of reconstruction and just after reconstruction. That is the only time in the history of the State of Mississippi when its bonds and its credit were not good.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I understand the argument of the Senator from Rhode Island, it is to the effect that the value of this emergency currency rests entirely upon the bonds that secure it; that if a bank deposits $100,000 in bonds with the Comptroller of the Currency and issues $90,000 currency upon the bonds so deposited, and the bonds, when they are sold, only realize $85,000, if the Government had no further assets on which to fall back, that $5,000 out of the $90,000 would be a loss in whosoever's hands it should be. I do not understand this bill in that way. The Government guarantees, as I understand, every dollar; and whether these bonds would be worth one cent or not, the Government itself stands back of every emergency dollar that is issued by the bank and absolutely redeems it. If that be true, what is the basis of the real value and the confidence of the people in those emergency dollars if it is not in the guaranty of the Government itself?

The Government, not as a basis for the currency, but to protect its guaranty, accepts $100,000 of bonds, upon which it might allow the bank to issue $90,000 in currency; in other words, it loans the bank that much currency to issue as money, upon which the bank turns over to it as a pledge $100,000 worth of bonds. If that be true, then certainly it seems to follow that the Government itself should lose rather than the depositor in the bank. The Government will pay every dollar of that issue. It does not need any more protection than it has got now.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, as the Senator from North Dakota has undertaken to say what my understanding is, perhaps I had better express it myself, because I do not find myself in entire accord with him. We propose to issue national-bank notes, Government notes issued through the instrumentality of a bank, and we propose that the United States shall guarantee the redemption of those notes. Back of that, and subsequent to that, we have the credit of the bank; then we have a certain specific deposit of securities; then we have a prior lien upon the assets of the bank, and then we have the double liability of the stockholders of the bank. The plea which you gentlemen are making for depositors is not, and can never be, for the depositors. If any loss occurs, it will fall upon the stockholders of the bank and not upon the depositors. But whether it falls upon the stockholders or the depositors, I say that this great array of security is for the protection of the people of the United States, and I do not propose for myself to take away any one of the safeguards which we throw around the currency, and which, as I say, have existed without question for forty years under the national banking act and for more than a century under the act of 1797.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, the people of the United States do not want anything to which they are not morally as well as legally entitled. The people of the United States do not want the United States guaranty at the expense of the depositors in any bank. Many of these depositors are people who have worked and made their living, some behind the counter, some in the professions, and some eating their bread in the sweat of their faces, and the people of the United States do not wish to have the earnings and the small savings of these people go to the United States, when it is not morally right that they should do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator from Mississippi can not escape the fact that his pleading here is not for the depositors, but for the stockholders of the national banks—practically, I mean.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, that is not the fact. I do not mean——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the practical effect.

Mr. McLAURIN. It is not the practical effect of it. It is not to protect the stockholders, because so long as the stockholders are liable, there is no trouble with the depositors and no trouble with the United States. If the stockholders are responsible men, and they are liable for the indebtedness of the bank, then neither the depositors nor the Government of the United States can lose their money.

Another thing. The Senator said that he knew of a time when the promises of the Government, the Government notes, were at a discount; when they were not at par; when they were not worth as much as their face called for. Were the bank notes worth any more than the Treasury notes of the United States at that time? The Senator shakes his head, to indicate that they were not. Then, if they were not, if there is anything added to them by the deposit of these bonds, why is it that they were not worth more?

Mr. ALDRICH. They were guaranteed then, as they are now, by the deposit of bonds.

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly; just exactly then as now, but the deposit of bonds did not add any strength to the circulating medium; it did not add anything to the strength of the notes at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. But, Mr. President, does the Senator from Mississippi suppose that any patriotic Senator would have then arisen in this body and undertaken to have taken away from the Government of the United States the security which it had against the bank stockholders?

Mr. McLAURIN. I surely would, Mr. President, and every other Senator ought to do it, but whether they would or not, I would have done it in behalf of the men whose money made up its assets; and it ought to be done. The Senator can not appeal to me upon patriotism. My patriotism is as good as his or anybody's else. I love my country. The Senator can not escape from the predicament in which he has placed himself by any appeal such as that.

But to get back now to the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT]. The Senator from California said that the people of California could take their bonds—I did not catch whether they could take municipal bonds as well as State bonds or not—but they could take bonds and get any amount of money on them during this last panic. Why did the people of the State of California permit this panic to come if money was in such quantities there, so that all a person had to do was to take his bonds and get money? The Senator said that they were used for the purpose of depositing them in order to issue money upon them. The Government was not authorized to issue any bank notes upon such bonds. The Government could loan money upon such bonds, as it did in the State of New York, and as it did probably in other portions of the country; but if the bonds were in abundance, if they would command money at any price, why was the panic permitted to exist?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] stated a moment ago that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] had expressed his views for him with reference to this matter, and now the Senator from Mississippi attempts to state my views. I did not say that the bonds of the State of California or of any municipality in the State of California could be sold for any price at any time and could be used as a basis for issuing circulation under a bill such as this Aldrich bill. What I did say was that neither the bonds of the State of California nor the bonds of any municipality in the State of California during the period of this financial depression sold for less than 90 cents on the dollar, and I asked the Senator from Mississippi whether he knew of any State or municipal bonds that so sold.

What I did say was that in the event this bill is passed, then the bonds of municipalities and bonds of the State of California and of the State of Mississippi would be bought and sold for the purpose of issuing currency under this bill; which will be the fact. My own view about this is just as was stated by the Senator from Rhode Island, that the bonds should be first a security for the emergency bank-note circulation, and in the event that there should be any failure of that security, then the entire deposits of such bank should be used, if necessary, to make that money good; but, in addition to that, the stockholders should be followed and the loss, if any, should be made good; in other words, that this money should be just as good money as ever was issued by this Government.

After making that statement, I want to say that, in my opinion, there is no doubt about this money being good. The bonds themselves are sufficient security for it. Under the bill the bonds to be used must not only be bonds of a State, a municipality, or a county, but such bonds of a State, a municipality, or a county as the Secretary of the Treasury will accept, and he never would accept a bond of any State or municipality or county unless it was perfect security for the money at the rate of 90 cents on the dollar as provided in this bill.

I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question. If he is in favor of withdrawing the provision that makes the issuance of this money a lien on the assets of the bank, why not carry it further and provide that for Government money deposited in banks the Government of the United States shall not have a prior lien on the assets of the institution? Why stop at this point? Why not apply it to Government deposits?

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, the Senator asks two or three questions in one. He asks first, if I know of any bonds that were selling in Mississippi at less than par during the late panic. I have answered that time and again——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Less than 90 cents.

Mr. McLAURIN. Less than 90 cents? Put that in, if it amounts to anything. Was it 90 cents?

Mr. FLINT. Ninety cents.

Mr. McLAURIN. Very well. I do not wish to misstate the position of the Senator. I have said time and again that I do not know of any bonds selling at all in Mississippi or anywhere else at that time. They could not be sold, because there was no money in circulation to buy them with; that is, so far as I have heard up to this time. If the Senator from California knows of any bonds selling during that time, he is the first person I have met who has known of bonds selling for any price during the panic. They could not be sold, because money could not be realized with which to buy them.

The Senator asks me why I do not go further and make Government deposits liable to the depositors. I have not offered to make anything that the Government has liable to the depositors. I would have the Government take the security that it has carved out and realize upon that, and when it takes that security which it has carved out for its guaranty of the bank notes, if it is not sufficient to indemnify the Government, then it ought not to take the deposits of the depositors. That is my position.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do.

Mr FLINT. The Senator does not state the proposition correctly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I have not fully answered the proposition of the Senator, but I reckon I will not overlook some things I want to call his attention to.

Mr. FLINT. What I want to call to the attention of the Senator is that now the deposits of Government money in the banks constitute a prior lien upon the assets of the bank, as I understand. The Senator provides in the amendment that the issuance of this money shall not be a prior lien upon the assets of the bank. Is that correct?

Mr. McLAURIN. My amendment is that when the Government exhausts the securities which it took at the time of making the loan of bank notes to the bank its rights upon the balance of the assets of the bank shall be subordinated to the lawful claims of all creditors. Now, if the Senator——

Mr. FLINT. Why not carry that further and have the same rule apply to the deposits of Government money in the banks?

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator support the amendment if I do that?

Mr. FLINT. I will not.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then what is the use to bring that in, because it is not germane to this discussion and it is not involved in it? The amendment does not propose that. Let us discuss the merits of the proposition before the Senate.

Mr. FLINT. What I wanted the Senator to answer is this: If this doctrine is correct, that depositors in a bank will think the bank unsafe by reason of this prior lien, why should the Government be given a prior lien because of its deposits in the bank?

Mr. McLAURIN. That might be a good argument to induce the Congress to enact into the law some provision in reference to Government deposits, and if that proposition were before the Senate I should vote for it, I will say to the Senator from California.

Mr. FLINT rose.

Mr. McLAURIN. I desire, before the Senator interjects another question, to answer the position he has taken on the floor.

Mr. President, the Senator recognizes the fact that there may be some bonds taken that are not worth 90 cents on the dollar.

Mr. FLINT rose.

Mr. McLAURIN. Hold on. Let me get through. Then I will yield. The Senator said that he wants the law so that if the bonds do not realize the 90 per cent to make up the guaranty of the Government for the national-bank notes, the Government shall have a lien upon the assets. That is what the Senator stated.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do.

Mr. FLINT. After stating that proposition, though, I made the further statement that in my opinion that condition could not exist by reason of the fact that I did not consider that there was any bond that would be accepted by the Secretary of the Treasury which would not be sufficient to pay these notes, and no loss could fall upon the depositors of the bank.

Mr. McLAURIN. If that be true, there was no necessity for stating that the Senator wants a provision that if the bonds do not realize the 90 per cent the Government shall, for the balance of the money, have a lien upon the deposits of the depositors. And there could be no argument in it, because if the Senator is correct that that condition never could arise, then there is no necessity at all for that kind of an argument. If that is so, then there could be no harm done by this amendment, and it may do a great deal of good. It may assure depositors, and no harm can result from the adoption of the amendment; and there is no reason why such a strenuous opposition should be made to the amendment if it be true that no bonds will be taken upon which 90 per cent can not be realized, because the Government never could lose anything in the very nature of the case, if that be true, and it could do a great deal of good in assuring depositors.

Mr. President, I have done the best I could to make myself intelligible upon this proposition. I hope I have done so. It has been in a desultory, disconnected way, to be sure, but in many instances that has been because of the fact that I have been led off from the discussion by questions and propositions that seemed to one Senator, at least, to be very much wanting in intelligence or to come from a Senator who is not intelligent. I do hope that the Senator from Rhode Island will do himself the credit to get up here and say that no possible harm could come to the soundness and the solvency of bank notes by this amendment; and I want him, instead of denying it, to say that the thing which gives validity to the national-bank notes and gives currency to them and circulation to them is the fact that they are guaranteed by the Government of the United States and not the fact that the Government is indemnified, because the Government is able to pay whether it is indemnified or not, and that is the ability upon which everybody relies when he takes a bank note, for nobody ever looks to see by what bank a bank note is issued or to ascertain what is the amount of the bonds deposited for its security. The money is good. When the Government's credit was less than a hundred cents in the dollar the bank bills were worth less than a hundred cents in the dollar; and when the Government's credit is worth a hundred cents in the dollar the bank bills are worth a hundred cents in the dollar, just like Treasury notes of the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I can not accede to the suggestion of my friend the Senator from Mississippi, but I can bear cheerful witness to both the intelligence and the patriotism of that Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN].

Mr. McLAURIN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. McLAURIN. I call for a division.

Mr. ALDRICH. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRIGGS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who I am sorry to say is necessarily detained on account of sickness. But I transfer the pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON]. I make this announcement not only for this vote, but for all votes on the pending bill. I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] and its transfer to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]; so that for the day—and I will not announce it again—the pair will stand between the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GAMBLE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. An arrangement has been made by which the pair is transferred to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLAY. My colleague [Mr. BACON] is paired on this bill and all amendments with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. FRAZIER (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. FRAZIER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota, and as he has not voted I withdraw my vote.

Mr. ELKINS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], but the pair has been transferred to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. I have voted "nay." I will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is detained from the Chamber, and is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. BRIGGS. I desire to announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAURIN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That upon presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury, or Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, by any other person than a bank, of any of the class of bonds specified in this bill upon which money can be issued to the banks, or upon which bank notes are permitted to be issued by the banks, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to the holder of such bond, or bonds, Treasury notes to the same amount that bank notes are permitted to be issued thereon to banks, up to the amount of issuance limited by this bill.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, page 7, after the words "shall pay," insert:

For the first six months.

And in line 7, page 7, after the word "bonds," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the words:

And afterwards a monthly tax of three-quarters of 1 per cent upon the average amount of said notes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to the amendments. I am willing to accept them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I had prepared a number of amendments which I had intended to offer to this bill, anticipating that it would be perhaps the last opportunity for some time to come within which some of the obvious defects of our national-bank law might be remedied. But upon the understanding and the assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Finance that this matter will be the subject of investigation in some form, either through the Committee on Finance or by a commission, I will waive a number of those proposed amendments.

I want to understand from the chairman of the Committee on Finance if it is his understanding that this shall be done—that a careful, thoroughgoing investigation into the causes of the panic shall be made and proper recommendations made to the Senate hereafter when that investigation shall have been concluded?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it is obvious to me, as I think it must be to all the members of the Senate, that the recent events and the discussion of this question in this Chamber have shown the absolute necessity of taking up this question in a legislative way, and that the preparation of it should be entered upon in the immediate future.

I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that it is my purpose either to ask that the Committee on Finance be intrusted with this duty or that Congress in some other way shall authorize an immediate investigation of the whole subject, with a purpose of presenting to Congress recommendations for a complete reform of the banking laws.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to place in the RECORD a proposed amendment which I had intended to offer and to press on the attention of the Senate. I merely ask that it may go in the RECORD for the information of members of the Senate who may be interested in it.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to prepare and have available not less than $500,000,000 of United States notes, for the purposes of this act, having all of the legal qualities and of the same form as the United States notes now outstanding, to be kept in a special fund to be known as the 'circulation fund.' Such notes shall be printed of convenient denominations of not less than $5 nor more than $10,000 each. Such notes shall be advanced by the Treasurer of the United States, in the manner and to the amount determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, to any national banking association or to any bank or trust company organized under the laws of any of the States of the Union, upon application therefor and upon the deposit of securities of the classes hereinafter described which are acceptable to the Treasurer of the United States and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; such advances shall be made by contract a first lien on the assets of the bank or trust company receiving the same and shall not be in excess of 90 per cent of the market value of such bonds. The Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall accept, as security for the United States notes herein provided for, the bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the United States, or of any State of the United States, or any legally authorized bonds issued by any city, town, county, or other legally constituted municipality or district in the United States which has been in existence for a period of ten years and which has never, within ten years previously to the tender of such securities, defaulted in the payment of any part of the principal or interest of any funded debt authorized to be contracted by it, and whose net funded indebtedness does not exceed 10 per cent of valuation of its taxable property, as shown by the last preceding valuation of property, for the assessment of taxes. No bond bearing in excess of 5 per cent interest shall be accepted as security for such advances. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain information with reference to the value and character of the securities herein authorized to be accepted, or to be held as a part of the legal reserve of national banking associations, and he shall from time to time furnish information to national banking associations as to such bonds as would be acceptable as security under the provisions of this act. The securities deposited under the authority of this act shall be subject to like rules as bonds deposited by national banking associations for the security of their circulation as far as the same may be made applicable thereto under the provisions of this act.

"Such advances made from the 'circulation fund' shall be charged for at a rate of 6 per cent per annum for the first four months, and thereafter at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, not exceeding a total period of one year. In the event of the depreciation of the market value of such bonds further security shall be required to preserve the margin of 10 per cent, under penalty of sale of such securities on the open market. The advances made from such fund shall be repaid within twelve months, and in default thereof the bonds shall be sold, and after the repayment of the principal and interest of such advances and the cost of sale the balance shall be returned to the owner of such bonds. This act shall not be construed to limit the issue of such notes if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury an emergency exists for a larger issue than the amount required to be prepared by this act. The interest accruing on the loan of such notes shall go into the 'liquidation fund' hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act the profits accruing from the tax on the circulation of the national banking associations, together with the interest accruing from the loan of the United States notes herein above provided, shall go into a 'liquidation fund.' From such liquidation fund, whenever a national bank is declared insolvent by the Comptroller of the Currency, the depositors of such bank shall be paid in full immediately, and such insolvent bank be charged with the amount so advanced as a first lien against its assets. The net liquidated assets of such bank shall be deposited to the credit of the liquidation fund to the extent required to reimburse such fund the money advanced therefrom. If necessary to meet the demands made on the liquidation fund, the Comptroller of the Currency may impose a tax upon the national banking associations not to exceed one-tenth of 1 per cent upon their average deposits in any one year as shown by their regular reports to the Comptroller of the Currency, which shall be added to such fund. Said fund may be invested in the 2 per cent bonds of the United States to the extent deemed advisable by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"No deposit which within sixty days prior to insolvency has been under contract to bear interest shall be included in the insurance provided by this act, and such deposit shall not be paid out of the liquidation fund herein provided for. The insurance of deposits herein provided shall not be operative until March 1, 1910, except in States in which a plan of insurance of deposits in State banks shall have been provided.

"SEC. 3. That no national banking association shall hereafter make loans or extend credit of any kind for the buying of stocks, bonds, or agricultural or food products, for speculative purposes, which in the aggregate exceed its unimpaired capital stock.

"No active officer of any national banking association shall borrow from such banking association or make any loans of its funds directly or indirectly to himself without the written consent in each instance of three-fourths of the directors thereof, under penalty of immediate dismissal from office by the board of directors on the demand of the Comptroller of the Currency.

"Every national banking association not in reserve or central reserve cities shall hereafter hold, as part of its legal reserve, at all times in its own vaults a sum of lawful money equal to at least 9 per cent of its deposits, and the remainder of the legal reserve now required by law shall be held by such banks in the classes of bonds described in section 1 of this act. Every national banking association in reserve or in central reserve cities shall hereafter hold, as part of its legal reserve, a sum not less than 15 per cent of its deposit liabilities in lawful money, and the remainder of the reserve of 25 per cent required by law may be carried in bonds of the classes described in section 1 of this act.

"Only the net favorable balance of a reciprocal account kept by any national banking association with a reserve agent shall be counted as part of the legal reserve.

"Bonds held as a part of the reserve must be of the classes expressly approved by the Comptroller of the Currency."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That national banking associations may, under the direction and supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, be authorized to loan not to exceed one-third of their capital and surplus upon personal note or bond, secured by a first mortgage, of the maker or obligee, upon improved, occupied, and cultivated farms, not exceeding in any case one-half of the cash value of the farm. The Comptroller of the Currency shall prescribe the necessary rules and regulations for making such loans.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have no desire to take up the time of the Senate with any lengthy debate. I simply wish to state to the Senate that for many years there has been a great demand among the national banks in the West and Northwest, especially the smaller banks, for the privilege of loaning a limited amount on real estate security on improved farms. It is regarded out in that country as the very best security. They not only have the personal obligations of the maker of the note or bond, but in addition to that they have the real estate security, and we have found out there that the very best security is confined to improved and cultivated farms.

By looking over the report of the Comptroller of the Currency you will find that our big banks, our national banks, have a large part of their capital and surplus tied up in long-time, permanent securities, like railroad bonds and long-time bonds. In the case of a panic such as we had, when money can not be obtained, you can not realize money on that kind of securities quicker than on first-class bonds. Our banks invest their money in these long-time securities.

They do not invest, as a rule, in municipal bonds, school bonds, or in State bonds. Those bonds, owing to the low rate of interest, generally find their way to the East, to Wall street.

Our banks confine themselves to commercial loans and to the better class of real estate loans. Now, our national banks are under a great disadvantage. Under our State laws out West the State banks loan on real estate security under proper guard and limitation. Our national banks are cut off from this privilege, although in many instances they evade the law. They evade it by some of the officers or directors of the bank going to the bank and borrowing money on their own notes, putting up the mortgage on a farm as collateral security, so that practically in that way they take these farm loans. But many good bankers have said to me, "We hate to evade the law in this way. We dislike to do it. We prefer, if we can, to have the privilege to loan on real estate."

Last fall, in the midst of the panic, just before I left my own home, I stepped into our First National Bank, the leading bank. There was a large package done up on the table of the president. He pointed it out to me and said:

Mr. NELSON, there is a bundle of $100,000 in farm mortgages on the best farms in this country. I have got to send them East to money lenders there. I can not take them. All I can do is to take five and ten thousand dollar loans from the jobbers, the flour men, and the mill men here and down below in the Twin City and at other points. I may get a loan of five or ten thousand dollars for thirty, or sixty, or ninety days or six months, from one of these big firms, and yet I have no means of knowing how many of those five or ten thousand dollar notes the firm has outstanding. The firm I know is rated high, but in this emergency under these conditions I have no means of ascertaining how many notes are outstanding against the company.

I remember our experience very well in the panic of 1893–94, and the runs that were then made on many of our smaller country banks. A great many bankers came to me, for I was governor at that time. They came to me at the capital and related their experience. Depositors would get scared and would come to a bank and want their money. The banker would honestly tell them, "My dear sir, when I received your money I agreed to pay you 3 per cent interest on your deposits. I could not let your money lie idle. I had to loan it out. I have loaned the money out on a mortgage to one of your neighbors. I have not got the money to return to you, but I can give you the mortgage;" and in many instances the depositors were perfectly glad and willing to take those mortgages, for they were mortgages in their own county and upon the land of their own neighbors.

This amendment is very limited. It does not allow more than one-third of the capital and surplus to be loaned out, and it is limited to loans on improved, occupied, and cultivated farms. It includes no wild land, no land held by mere speculators to be mortgaged, no village property or town property, property which ordinarily in order to make good security requires a stiff insurance policy with it. There is nothing of that kind in the amendment. It is only a class of loans that will be of advantage and that can be utilized by our smaller banks in the country.

I have been trying to do this for years. I introduced a bill relating to this subject on three several occasions, but as usual I have found my good friend the chairman of the Finance Committee incorrigible, as he is on a good many financial subjects. It is unfortunate, and I do not say it in any discreditable sense; I do not say it for the purpose of reflecting on anybody; there is nothing further from me than that; but if we had in the Senate a rule, which prevails among the courts of the country, that no one should pass on the question who has an interest in a national bank or who owns any stock in a national bank or is an official, we could get pretty good legislation. We are handicapped in this way. I say this in a friendly and Christian spirit and not for the purpose of reflecting upon anyone in this body.

I trust the Senator from Rhode Island will meet this question in a liberal and statesmanlike manner, especially looking to the great West that stood as a buttress in the late panic, the great West that furnished the wheat and the cotton that brought the hundred million dollars of gold. I hope that his heart will go out to that West and that he will stand for this little amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, this proposition has been before the committee, and on several occasions it has been considered and voted on.

Mr. NELSON. No, no.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, yes.

Mr. NELSON. No; the committee never reported it.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator has offered it as an amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I offered it once as an amendment to your financial bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was voted down.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; but that is not saying that it will be voted down now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand.

Mr. NELSON. We live to learn.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that perfectly.

It is undoubtedly true that farm mortgages are good securities for certain people to hold, but they are the very worst possible securities that a commercial bank could hold. Suppose, for instance, that during the recent panic the banks of this country had been loaded up or loaded down with farm mortgages, the suspension which was temporary would have been absolutely permanent.

It is no part of the business of a commercial bank to accept and to deal in farm mortgages. It is contrary to every principle of banking, and it has always been so understood in every country in the world. There is not a civilized country where the ordinary commercial banks are permitted to take farm mortgages. They are inconvertible securities, absolutely inconvertible securities, and I am a little surprised that a Senator, with the wisdom of the Senator from Minnesota, should be as pertinacious as he is in the defense and advocacy of an amendment which, it seems to me, is so repugnant to every sound principle of banking.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, to my mind there is nothing more repugnant to sound banking than to have commercial banks, instead of devoting their loans to purposes of commerce and trade, to commercial loans, invest a large part of their money in these call and speculative loans; and when you get a money panic such as you had last fall, when you can not get money at any price almost, you can not sell any kind of securities. Out where I live—and I am sorry the Senator from Rhode Island has never been out in our country; I wish he could have been there during the panic—out in our country the very best securities we have, and securities that will always bring money quicker than any railroad bonds, or school, or municipal bonds, are first-class farm mortgages.

The Senator says that those are not quick assets. They are as quick as anything can be. We found in the recent panic that the quick assets that the stock exchanges dabble in were not as quick as they might be, for it took about $20,000,000 of Government deposits to stop it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think it would conduce to more agreeable and better legislation if some of the Senators in this Chamber would sometimes get on the west side of the Allegheny Mountains and understand some of the conditions of the Middle West and the Northwestern section of the country. The Senator from Rhode Island has always been in favor of holding long-time securities bearing an annual interest. He considers them absolutely good in any of the banks. In fact, he desires to make them the basis of currency. I have never myself been able to see why a good mortgage on improved farm lands was not the very best security that could be possibly offered. Any man in the State of Minnesota or in the State of North Dakota or South Dakota knows that he can sell one of those mortgages and turn it into cash for its face value quicker than any other possible character of security that he could get hold of. Whenever the bank is closed, if money is in circulation at all, there is never a time that it can not get rid of its farm mortgages. There are many times reasonably close when it is impossible to sell farmers' notes that are unsecured, when it is even impossible to sell the grain-elevator notes that are held in our banks to furnish the money for moving our grain, and yet I know from my own personal knowledge that during our last stringency farm mortgages were being taken out in my State for the new lands that are being improved when you could not get money for any other purpose.

If the object is to compel the banks to get hold of such security as they can realize upon, every Senator in the Middle West and the Northwest knows that they can realize quicker upon good farm mortgages than they can upon any other kind of security known in the West and held in the West. That being the case, I am unable to understand this general objection to a farm mortgage. To be sure, if you have to enforce it ordinarily——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me complete the sentence, and then I will yield. If you have to enforce it by foreclosing upon your mortgage, it would take a year or more to do it, because there would be a year for redemption, and I understand that that is the principal objection. But it is equally true if you have to enforce ordinary bills payable against a debtor you have to go into the courts, and when you put it in judgment ordinarily it may take six months or a year. It will take as long to realize, if you have to realize out of real estate, as it would to foreclose your mortgage, and ordinarily it would require twice as long.

The real value in the security is the ability not so much to enforce its collection as it is to have something that you can immediately dispose of and turn into cash. When you come to that proposition there is nothing held in any of the banks of the Northwest that is as easily convertible into cash as good farm loans, which are generally based upon about one-third of the value of the property. I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether the State banks in the West loan money on farm mortgages?

Mr. McCUMBER. Ordinarily the same rules have been adopted by the States which have incorporated State banks as govern the national banks. They have followed that rule. I say I see no reason, however, why either the national banking law or any State banking law should rule against the use of good convertible farm mortgages when at the same time acknowledging the use of the other long-time securities that can not be converted any more quickly, and because they do not bear as good a rate of interest, in fact, can not be converted as quickly into cash as the farm mortgages.

I know the general sentiment against banks loaning upon real estate, but I think that the Senator from Minnesota has properly and correctly given the conditions as they affect the banks in the Northwest and the remedy that ought to be applied.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and also the Senator from Minnesota [Mr.

NELSON] referred to the general opposition east of the Alleghenies, we will say, to the making of loans upon farm mortgages or real estate securities.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? There are only three members of the committee out of thirteen who live east of the Alleghenies; and if there is any sort of discrimination, it comes from men who live west of the Alleghenies and some of them west of the Mississippi. There never has been any difference of opinion in the committee as to this particular proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will excuse me, he indicated, in a controversy with the Senator from Wisconsin, that the predominance of the intellect of that committee is in a little State east of the Alleghenies.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to say the reason I think why the Eastern people, certainly the New England people, have a dread of banks with power to loan on land security is that in the eighteenth century we had a very bitter experience in what was known as the "land banks." They were, I think, tried in all the New England States of that period—they certainly were tried in mine—and they were absolutely ruinous. They were banks that were allowed to lend money on land.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Massachusetts must remember that in the seventeenth century the Mississippi Valley was wholly unsettled.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say the seventeenth century; I said the eighteenth.

Mr. NELSON. Even in the eighteenth century it was pretty nearly all unsettled.

Mr. LODGE. I think it was unsettled, and our part of the country was then very partially settled, and we got our lesson then. I think it is very fortunate that the Mississippi Valley has been spared from going through what we went through, because we had to learn our lesson by bitter experience. I think the disasters which were caused by what were known as the "land banks" produced an effect on the general opinion in my part of the country which they never recovered from. I really think that hostility to any bank founded in that way has endured to this time.

Of course I do not refer to the savings banks, which are carefully protected by laws which enable them to prevent runs and give them time to realize, but banks that have to meet demands right over the counter for cash and that must have securities not only which are valuable, but securities which are convertible in a moment in the open market—not, perhaps, at their face value, but which can be sold at once. I only referred to that because the Senator wondered why we had so much opposition to the scheme. I think it is owing to the disasters we had from banks of that kind.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I tried to correct the Senator in was the idea that real-estate securities could not be converted at once. Possibly they can not be converted in the East as quickly as the other character of mortgages, but in our own State and in the whole Northwest (and I think every Senator who lives out in that section will bear me out in this statement) they can be converted into cash much easier than any other securities out there that are taken by the banks.

Mr. ANKENY. I think there is a little misunderstanding, Mr. President, about this collateral in the West. In recent times we had an opportunity to try all kinds, and, like the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], we found that our best securities were our farm loans.

I want to speak of one little incident which will convey my meaning. I found a little bank in distress in 1893. The emergency arose to do something. So we found that most of our securities were for two good names at the time they were made, but closer investigation showed that those farms were mortgaged in the East to loan companies, some of which were in the hands of the receiver. I simply was called upon to do something. I told the owners of the bank that we must have more money; that is, to take up not only this first mortgage that was over the real estate, but that we would take that up and take the assignment from the loan companies that were in the hands of the receiver.

To make a long story short, only touching the high places, we realized upon every dollar of those loans. We realized upon all our subsequent loans, secured only by their names, and reinstated every man in the property, and they are all prosperous and good people to-day. If you can find a record of securities that is better than that, I should like to hear of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Washington did not understand me as objecting to the class of securities on farm mortgages in the West. They are good. I said they are good for certain purposes, but not for banking purposes.

Mr. ANKENY. They stood us in hand very well at that time, surely. They were always known as good securities. They were convertible; there was demand against which you could pay with a mortgage at any time.

As to a change of policy of commercial banks, that may be against your wish in the matter, but the fact is that those loans are taken and made there every day, and I think we have got our first loss to make.

That is all I want to say about farm loans.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the amendment, if Senators will give me the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, I inquire if the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote. I inadvertently voted, not noticing that the Senator from California was absent.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Ankeny	Culberson	Gore	Nelson
Bankhead	Cullom	La Follette	Piles

Clarke, Ark.	Hemenway	Platt

So Mr. NELSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the words "of the United States," in line 4, page 7, down to the word "every," in line 7, page 8, and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall pay a monthly tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent during the first three months after they shall be issued and of one-half of 1 per cent afterwards upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such bonds."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to press the amendment this afternoon. I have introduced it at this time simply for the purpose of calling it to the attention of the committee, so that it may be considered at their meeting to-morrow. The amendment has not up to this time been before the committee for consideration. To-morrow I shall submit some remarks in favor of the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suppose we can offer amendments to-morrow. As I understand, the committee is then to have a meeting, certain amendments will be before the committee, and the matter can be brought up to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, evidently we shall not be able to finish the bill to-night, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 26, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 25, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SCOTT. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent that there be five hours more of general debate, the time to be divided equally between the respective sides of the House, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] to control the time of the minority and myself to control the time of the majority.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that general debate on the agricultural appropriation bill close in five hours, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB]. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. I object.

Mr. SCOTT. I move, Mr. Speaker, that general debate on the agricultural bill close in four hours, the time to be equally divided as suggested in my former request, and on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion will be in order to close debate in four hours.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SULZER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULZER. What is the regular order of the day?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is this motion.

Mr. SULZER. I want to call the Chair's attention——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to hear any discussion upon the point of order. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on his motion.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the motion to close debate in four hours.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to reconsider the motion and lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SULZER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SULZER. I rise for the purpose of propounding to the Speaker a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House to inquire about. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. The Chair can not determine that until the interrogatory is propounded.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas suspend? The Chair was mistaken. There was pending a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from New York will propound his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SULZER. Accepting the apology of the Chair, my parliamentary inquiry is——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York may put it that way, but the Chair will apologize to the gentleman when in error as quick as to any gentleman in the House.

Mr. SULZER. And so would the gentleman from New York. Mr. Speaker, under Rule XXIV, clause 6, it says, "the morning hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees." I would like to know whether we are not entitled under that provision in the rules to have committees call up bills during the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. But a privileged motion has intervened.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion that I made to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas withdraws his motion.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following report from the Appropriation Committee on the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill H. R. 16882, an act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to all the Senate amendments as recommended by the committee and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the House discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and consider the bill in the House, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. I object.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], exercising his undoubted privilege, but exercising it in a very unusual way, objects to having this appropriation bill immediately go to conference. The Senate has placed upon this bill 365 amendments. A great many of these amendments are of very slight importance. Some of them are of large importance. Members will recognize that it is desirable in a contest between the House and the Senate that the House should not in the very first instance say what Senate amendments they are willing to accept, and therefore take away our whole stock for trading. Therefore it has always been the custom—and I hope the custom will be observed now—to reject all the Senate amendments regardless of our opinion of their merits and send them all to conference. Then, in conference the conferees will decide, and if there is anything that the House or any of the Members of the House wish especially to consider, it will be brought to the House for consideration; but that course leaves the conferees of the House with the Senate amendments which the House approves still disagreed to, so that the House, by yielding to those, can compel the Senate to yield on amendments which the House does not approve. Therefore, it is obviously the policy of the House to disagree to all the amendments. I think there will be no objection on the part of the House to doing this, and so have no remarks to make on any amendments, but call for their reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee disagree to all the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that the Senate amendments be disagreed to.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House ask for a conference with the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. GILLETT, Mr. BRICK, and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On March 24, 1908:

H. R. 2915. An act for the relief of John P. Hunter; and

H. R. 17277. An act for the relief of George S. Patten, of Williams, Coconino County, Ariz.

LEGISLATION RECOMMENDED BY THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, which was read.

[For message see Senate proceedings of this day.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, under the usages of the House it has been customary only to refer the annual messages of the President to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. This is the second time this session that another message has been referred in that way.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will explain to the gentleman the reason for that. The annual message deals with a great many topics with which different committees of the House have jurisdiction. The second message sent in by the President and this message deal with several topics of which several committees have jurisdiction. It is therefore necessary to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in order that hereafter it may be distributed. I would also say to the gentleman that I have reported from the Committee on Ways and Means a resolution distributing the second message of the President, to which he refers. That resolution is now on the Calendar. I have not called up that resolution because gentlemen on that side desired me to wait until they were ready to debate it before it was called up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, at the time the last supplement to the annual message was presented to the House I made a hasty examination of the precedents and could find no instance where any message except the annual message had been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Now, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has pointed out, the last message from the President is now on the Calendar of the House, with the resolution distributing it. If the same action is taken regarding this message and the same delay occurs, I wish to emphasize the fact that it will not be possible to take action upon these recommendations at this session of Congress, as the President is urging this House to do. Perhaps if the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] would suggest to the President that if he would confine his messages to one topic, they could be more readily sent to the appropriate committees and the committees take them under consideration.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I want to say that the President is able to get up his messages without the recommendation of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My information, which is obtained from the public press, is that before this message was gotten up the President d' l confer with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as well as with several others.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the gentleman must be careful how he believes all he sees in the newspapers. [Laughter.] The gentleman from New York, however, is on visiting terms with the President of the United States.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, just a question. Can the gentleman from New York give us any information as to how long this message from the President will slumber in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that when the second message came in I introduced a resolution, I think the next day, distributing it, and I called it up before the Committee on Ways and Means at the very next meeting, and they promptly authorized it to be reported. When I brought it in here I was requested by the minority leader to allow a chance for debate. I do not know whether he is ready for debate on the resolution now or not. I have not called it up because the House has been busy with appropriation bills since. If I can have unanimous consent, I will call up the resolution at this moment and submit it to the House, moving to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from its further consideration.

Mr. SULZER. You have my consent to do it now. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I congratulate my colleague on stopping in his wild career.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to refer this message to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and that it be printed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the resolution—I do not remember the number—distributing the second message of the President, and consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House resolution No. 233 and the same be considered in the House at this time as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are you going to have any debate on it?

Mr. PAYNE. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I shall be constrained to object. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Resolution 233.

Resolved, That so much of the special message of the President of the United States communicated to the two Houses of Congress on January 31, 1908, as relates to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That so much as relates to the judiciary of the United States, to the administration of justice, to the punishment and prevention of crime, to judicial proceedings, civil and criminal, and to the organization of courts be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

That so much as relates to commerce and the Isthmian Canal be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

That so much as relates to the post-office and post-roads be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

That so much as relates to the public domain be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

That so much as relates to labor be referred to the Committee on Labor.

That so much as relates to private and domestic claims and demands, other than war claims, against the United States be referred to the Committee on Claims.

That so much as relates to reform in the civil service be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

That so much as relates to the election of the President, Vice-President, or Representatives in Congress be referred to the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, understanding there is a desire to debate this resolution, I shall object at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.
Mr. PAYNE. I am surprised.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to request before I begin my remarks that I be not interrupted until the close of what I have to say. It occurred to me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that it might be a good idea at this time to review somewhat the work of the Department of Agriculture. The appropriations for this Department for the last ten or twelve years have increased very rapidly, and it seems to me that the House has a right to know what is being done with the money. It seems to me that the House is entitled to knowledge of the details of at least some of the important projects the Department is undertaking to carry out.

The first appropriation was made by Congress in the interests of agriculture in 1839. At this time an appropriation of $1,000 was made for the purpose of "collecting and distributing seeds, prosecuting agricultural investigation, and procuring agricultural statistics." At this time the agricultural division was located in the Patent Office.

The Commissioner of Patents was also the Commissioner of Agriculture. A great many valuable seeds, plants, and shrubs were sent to the Commissioner of Patents by our foreign consuls, and this work was continued in a small way for a number of years. In 1853 the appropriation reached $5,000; in 1855, $50,000, and in 1862, $64,000. During these twenty-three years, from the time the first appropriation was made, a considerable interest began to be manifested in different parts of the country in agriculture. The farmers' grange and other agricultural associations began advocating the establishment of a separate bureau for the purpose of carrying on agricultural investigations and the dissemination of information of interest to farmers. In 1862 Congress responded to this general demand for the recognition of the agricultural interests and passed an act establishing such a bureau. This was the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture. It is interesting to note that during the dark and gloomy days of the civil war, when the patriotic people of the country were buckling on their armor and rallying to the defense of Old Glory, Congress found time to lay the foundation for a Department that has since grown to be one of the most important in the Government service. It is also interesting to note that this legislation came from the hands of the new Republican party during the first Administration of the first man they elevated to the Presidency.

The foundation laid by those who upheld the hands of our martyred Lincoln in that mighty conflict has resulted in the growth of a great department which employs 9,000 people, most of whom are scientists and experts of the very highest order. The result of this legislation is more far-reaching, affects more people, and contributes more to the wealth and happiness of the Republic than possibly any other single act passed by Congress since the beginning of the Government under the Constitution, in 1789. Congress is continually appropriating money for the maintenance of the different Departments of the Government service. All of these expenditures of the public funds do not add one dollar to the wealth of the nation. It is true that they help to make our country great. They contribute to the defense and add to the glory and greatness of the nation, yet there is no direct financial gain to the people or the Government. They simply constitute an expenditure of the public funds without any hope of a return from the investment. This is not true of the expenditures in the Department of Agriculture. The introduction of one single crop has added more wealth to the nation in the last five years than the entire expenditures of the whole Department since the first appropriation was made in 1839.

When the organic act of 1862 was passed creating the Bureau of Agriculture, Mr. Isaac Newton was appointed as the first Commissioner of Agriculture. The expenditures of the Bureau under Mr. Newton's administration from 1862 to 1867 increased from $64,000 to $99,100. During this administration of Mr. Isaac Newton several important introductions were made, the most important of which was sorghum which was introduced from France and China. The growth of this industry has continued during all the years following. Last year the crop grown in the United States, as a result of this early introduction, was worth $40,000,000.

Mr. Horace Capron succeeded Mr. Newton as Commissioner of Agriculture in 1867 and served until 1871. Mr. Capron succeeded in introducing the excelsior white schonen oats, the cavalier barley, and certain wheats from the Mediterranean which have become among the standard varieties of grain for the whole country.

Mr. Frederick Watts succeeded Mr. Capron in 1871 and served until 1877. His administration was made noteworthy on account of its introduction of the study of plant diseases.

Mr. Le Duc succeeded Mr. Watts and served from 1877 to 1881. It was during his administration that the first work was introduced affecting farm animals. In 1878 an appropriation of $10,000 was made for the purpose of making a study of hog cholera and pleuro-pneumonia among cattle.

Commissioner Loring was appointed by President Hayes in 1881 and served until 1885. During the administration of Mr. Loring the study of animal diseases was continued and the Bureau of Animal Industry was established. He first introduced the navel orange and distributed a great many seeds in California and Florida. This orange was introduced from Bahia, Brazil. The crop of navel oranges in California alone last year was worth $8,000,000.

Mr. Norman J. Colman was appointed by President Cleveland in 1885 and served until the end of his Administration. During the close of Mr. Cleveland's first Administration the Bureau of Agriculture was raised to the first rank and made one of the coordinate Departments of the Executive office, the Secretary of Agriculture becoming a member of the President's Cabinet. This act was passed February 9, 1889.

The only legislation of importance enacted during Mr. Colman's administration of the office, aside from making the Secretary a member of the Cabinet, was the enactment of what is known as the "Hatch law," which provided for the establishment of experiment stations in the different States of the Union, appropriating a maximum of $25,000, which was to be expended in making scientific research in agriculture. During Mr. Colman's administration the study of public highways began. The appropriations for the Bureau of Animal Industry were increased very materially, and the scope of the work of this Bureau was greatly enlarged and put on a more effective footing.

When Benjamin Harrison became President in 1889 he appointed Jeremiah Rusk Secretary of Agriculture, who served until the close of his Administration. Mr. Rusk took up the duties of his office with a great deal of enthusiasm and reorganized the various Bureaus of the Department. He began the publication of farmers' bulletins, which proved a very valuable medium through which to disseminate the information accumulated in the Department relating to agriculture. Pleuro-pneumonia among cattle was stamped out by the Bureau of Animal Industry. The Department took up the question of the development of foreign markets for our farm products. During his administration the Weather Bureau was transferred from the War Department to the Department of Agriculture.

He began the study of irrigation with a view of reclaiming the arid land of the West. Mr. Rusk also made considerable headway in the development of methods of spraying fruit trees in order to protect them from insect pests. He also introduced parasitical enemies of the scale insect that were infesting the citrus groves of California.

In 1893, at the beginning of Mr. Cleveland's second term, Hon. J. Sterling Morton, of Nebraska, became Secretary of Agriculture and served until the close of Mr. Cleveland's Administration. Secretary Morton systematized the work of the Department in a very effective way. He pointed out the necessity of a closer supervision of the expenditures of the Hatch fund through the State experiment stations. As a result of his recommendations Congress passed a law providing for a more rigid supervision of these stations, requiring an annual report to be made of the expenditures of the Government funds to the Secretary of Agriculture. The agricultural library was established in the Department, which proved of great benefit and convenience to the scientists and experts engaged in agricultural investigations. The Division of Soils was made a part of the Weather Bureau. The Division of Public Roads was greatly enlarged and the study of road construction was begun. During Mr. Morton's administration the Yearbook of Agriculture first made its appearance. At the close of his administration the appropriation for the Department was $2,448,763.

When President McKinley was inaugurated in 1897 he appointed Hon. James Wilson, of Iowa, Secretary of Agriculture. Mr. Wilson has continued in this capacity until the present time. While a great deal of credit is due to all of his predecessors, each one having a particular part to perform in the evolution of this great Department, yet it remained for Secretary Wilson to breathe new life into the work, bringing all the various bureaus to the highest state of efficiency, introducing in each a practical system for carrying on their labors and effective methods of carrying to the people the beneficial results of the experiments his experts and scientists were prosecuting in the various lines of agriculture. When Secretary Wilson took up the duties of his office there were employed in the Department 2,043 people. At the close of the last fiscal year, ending July 1, 1907, this number had increased to 9,107. There was appropriated for the first year of his administration of the office $2,448,332. The appropriation for this Department in the pending bill is $11,431,000. The number of employees has increased a little over 300 per cent, while the appropriations have increased 350 per cent. At this point I desire to pause to ask unanimous consent that I may insert in my remarks certain tables that I have, bearing on the agricultural development of the country.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED in the chair). The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] asks unanimous consent to insert certain data in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POLLARD. When Secretary Wilson assumed the duties of his office he found that the various State experiment stations of the country were carrying on experiments entirely independent of the Department of Agriculture here in Washington. There was no sympathetic relation, no cooperation. In fact, each seemed to be traveling along separate lines and entirely independent of the other. Secretary Wilson has succeeded in bringing about a complete change in this respect. To-day the United States Department of Agriculture is in close touch and works in perfect harmony with every State agricultural experiment station in the country. A close and rigid inspection is made of all money appropriated by Congress to be expended in these different State stations. The Department in Washington has become the great head of one of the most magnificent systems of scientific agricultural education there is in the world. The Agricultural Department here in Washington bears the same relation to the State experiment stations that a man's heart does to his body.

It is the great central organ from which flows a vast fund of scientific and technical information from experts and scientists who contribute very materially to the success of the agricultural experiment stations throughout the several States of the Union. While it is true that the different State stations carry on original research work that is of a local nature, yet this great Department here in Washington is in close touch with them and offers a helping hand in the study of all questions that are of more than local interest. Instead of discord, instead of jealousy existing between the State stations and the Agricultural Department, to-day there is perfect harmony and hearty cooperation.

If time would permit, I should like to enter into a detailed discussion of each of the various divisions and bureaus of this great Department, tracing the development and growth of each and showing the particular relations existing between each of these divisions and the farmer on the farm. Time forbids my entering into a discussion of the question in such great detail; consequently I will confine myself to a brief review of two or three of the great bureaus which have done so much toward advancing the science of agriculture, which has resulted in its elevation and giving to it the true dignity to which it is justly entitled.

I will first take up the Bureau of Animal Industry. The first work done along the lines of studying diseases of farm animals was in 1878, when an appropriation of $10,000 was made for this purpose. The Bureau of Animal Industry was organized under an act passed in 1884. From that time until the present there has been a rapid growth in this Bureau. From time to time Congress has enacted laws enlarging its scope and its duties. Beginning with an appropriation of $10,000 in 1878, it reached $144,440 in 1897. The appropriation for this Bureau for the present fiscal year is $1,032,480, in addition to the permanent appropriation of three millions for the enforcement of the meat-inspection act.

The act of 1884 creating the Bureau of Animal Industry as later amended in 1890 and in 1895 prevents the shipment into interstate commerce of live stock that is infected with contagious diseases. Under the act of 1884 and its amendments the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to establish quarantine boundaries, thus isolating diseased stock. Under the operations of this law the Bureau of Animal Industry has been able to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia, the foot-and-mouth disease, and other diseases that are a menace to the live stock of the country. The contagious disease known as "black leg" has almost been exterminated. Its prevalence has been reduced to such an extent that it is no longer feared by the cattlemen of the country. The extermination of these three diseases has saved millions of dollars to the farmers of the country.

Under these laws also the Secretary of Agriculture has waged relentless warfare against sheep and cattle scabies and cattle tick that is prevalent in the Southern States. The work of combating contagious diseases of live stock is carried on in cooperation with the State experiment stations and individual farmers, in each instance the State and the farmer bearing a portion of the expense. The method of the Department in waging warfare against these diseases is to send experts into the infected districts to simply give expert and scientific information for the eradication of these diseases, the local or State authorities furnishing whatever funds are necessary in the way of labor and materials necessary for prosecuting the work. This work is being carried on in an extensive manner, and the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry informed the Agricultural Committee during its hearings that the warfare against scabies in sheep and in cattle is being carried on relentlessly, and that he hopes in a year or two to stamp out these diseases entirely.

The work that has been carried on in the South against Texas fever has not made as great progress.

Investigations of this subject have been carried on for a long period of years, and the veterinarians of the Agricultural Department have finally discovered a remedy under which splendid results are reached. The extent of the territory affected by this disease and its universal prevalence in this infected area make the progress of the work very slow. Last year Congress appropriated $150,000 for this work. The pending bill carries $250,000. Even with this tremendous expenditure of money Doctor Melvin, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, says this work can not be completed for fifteen or twenty years. By legislative enactment Congress has directed the Bureau of Animal Industry to inspect all live stock imported into and exported from the United States. This Bureau is given supervision over stock carried in interstate commerce.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this "Texas fever," as they call it, and I would like to inquire of the gentleman if any part of this appropriation is directed toward the medical aspect of the case, because I know of my own observation, having had a case in which the matter was involved, that for two or three years the Department was really ignorant of the nature and extent, medically, of the disease, and were working upon it then. I would like to ask the gentleman if they have arrived at any conclusion as to the remedy, and so forth, that can be used to stop the disease?

Mr. POLLARD. I will be very glad to answer the gentleman. I do not care to be interrupted, but I will reply to his question. I can say, I think, with accuracy, that the Department has now reached the point where the veterinarians of the Department are thoroughly familiar with the disease, and the remedies that will result in its destruction. They are now employing these remedies throughout this area. The cattle-tick region is being gradually narrowed; the area infected by this disease is being gradually pushed southward, and, under the method employed by the Department, Doctor Melvin tells us that there is no question whatever that in the time specified he will be able to destroy this pest. I hope I have answered the gentleman's question to his satisfaction.

Strict regulations have been drawn providing for Federal inspection of cars in which stock is shipped, which guarantees safety and humane treatment to the animals while in transit. The beginning of the inspection of meat destined for interstate or foreign commerce began in 1890. Under an act that became effective August 30 of that year this Bureau was directed to inspect cured meats that were intended for export. The first law passed on this question was confined to cured meat intended for export. March 3, 1891, the scope of this law was enlarged. It directed the inspection of live animals, carcasses, and all meat products destined for interstate or foreign commerce. While this law provided for inspection of live animals and meat destined for interstate or foreign commerce, yet its terms were never enforced, excepting as it affected foreign commerce. A very rigid inspection, however, was made of all meat intended for export. This legislation proved of great value to the live-stock interests of the country. It was not until the act of June 30, 1906, became effective that strict and regular inspection was made of all our meat destined for both interstate and foreign commerce.

This law not only guaranteed the purity and wholesomeness of our meat intended for export, but it guaranteed the same to every American home that is a consumer of meat. Under the terms of this act the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to not only inspect meat as indicated, but it provides that he shall place his stamp upon it, thus guaranteeing to the consumers, whether at home or abroad, the purity and wholesomeness of American meat products. While the passage of this act produced a temporary depressing effect upon the live-stock interests of the country, yet I have no hesitancy in stating that it will prove of inestimable value as time goes on. The result of this legislation is that it practically puts the Government behind every package of meat that goes into the foreign markets. This will have a very decided effect in removing any prejudice or skepticism that may be entertained in the Old World as to the quality of our meat products. I think that in the next five years we will witness a very decided increase in the export of our meat products as a result of the operation of this law. While it is impossible to estimate in dollars and cents the direct benefits this Bureau has carried to the farmers of the country, yet there is no question but what the expenditures of the public money by this Bureau are worth a great many times more to the people than it costs.

Millions of dollars have been saved to the people by the extermination of contagious diseases that wrought great devastation wherever they got a foothold. You can not estimate in dollars and cents the value to the people of our own country to know that the meat that is eaten at every fireside throughout this great Republic is pure and wholesome, yet these are services this Department is furnishing.

The work of the Bureau of Plant Industry touches another side of the farmers' interests. This Bureau was established in 1900, and was formed by the consolidation of ten separate divisions, including vegetable physiology, pathology, botany, experimental gardens and grounds, pomology, Congressional seed distribution, grass and forage-plant investigations, sugar investigations, tea-culture investigations, and the Arlington experimental farm. I will not attempt to discuss in detail the divisions of this Bureau. Neither do I desire to limit the term "plant industry" to these divisions. I shall discuss it in its broadest sense, including the Bureau of Soils, the Bureau of Entomology, and the Bureau of Experiment Stations, as they all relate to plant life.

During the early administrations of the Department of Agriculture the introduction of new plants was confined to such plants as were brought here from abroad by our diplomatic and consular representatives in foreign countries.

When Secretary Wilson took charge of the office he introduced a new plan. Secretary Wilson had the advantage over his predecessors in being a practical farmer, having himself operated successfully for a number of years a farm in Iowa, one of the great States of the Middle West. His familiarity with farm problems enabled him to know the particular needs and demands of the farmer; consequently he introduced the idea of sending agricultural experts abroad for particular purposes. One of the problems that confronted Secretary Wilson was the question of introducing a new plant that would be adapted to the semiarid regions of the great West where the rainfall is very light. Coming from the great agricultural section of the West, he realized that there was great need of a variety of wheat that would be especially adapted to this section of the country. The problem that presented itself to him was threefold: One, the introduction of a variety of wheat that would extend northward from Kansas the area for growing winter wheat; another was the introduction of a variety of spring wheat that would be better adapted to the States of the great Northwest, as the yield of wheat in that great area was rapidly declining; third, the introduction of a variety of wheat that would be adapted to the semiarid regions of the West.

The Secretary sent one of the best trained agriculturists in the country to Russia. He spent months in traversing the arid desert regions of that great Empire in hopes that he might find some species of wheat that could be introduced in the semiarid parts of western Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma. When this expert came back to the States he brought with him two varieties of wheat, one known as the Durum and the other the Kharkov wheat. This was in the winter of 1899. The first seed, I believe, was planted either that year or in 1900. The Durum wheat was introduced first in western Kansas and Nebraska. This has proven to be a very valuable variety of wheat to the great semiarid regions covering the western parts of these two States. Eight years of experience has proven that this wheat will thrive and produce abundant crops in the semiarid sections. The yield of this crop last year amounted to 45,000,000 bushels, worth $30,000,000. Since its introduction there has been grown in the United States in the past eight years 131,000,000 bushels, worth over $90,000,000. This one crop has brought more money to the farmers of the Middle West than the entire cost of the Agricultural Department since the first appropriation was made in 1839. [Applause.] This variety of wheat is especially adapted to the semiarid regions of the Middle West. Only a few years ago——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Can the gentleman tell us which of the two varieties proved to be the most successful?

Mr. POLLARD. I will come to that. I will take up the other in its order. I desire to finish the discussion of this variety first.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. POLLARD. I might say that within the past fifteen years practically all of that area lying west of the one hundredth meridian was not supposed to be adapted to the raising of farm crops. During the early settlements of western Nebraska and western Kansas the farmers went in and planted corn and nothing but corn. Corn was the great staple crop, and the farmers that came there from portions of the country where corn was a good crop undertook to raise corn in this new country. Very little attention was paid to wheat or any other crop. As a result, a few dry years followed and they were compelled to leave that country. Since the introduction of Durum wheat, alfalfa, and other drought-resisting grains western Nebraska and western Kansas, western Oklahoma, and the western part of the two Dakotas have become among the richest agricultural portions of the United States. [Applause.] And that has all come about since Secretary Wilson assumed charge of this office.

Last fall I was campaigning in western Nebraska in the district of my colleague, Judge NORRIS. I made a speech one evening at a little town that had a population of about 700, and the next morning I visited different business establishments. I went into two banks located in that little town. One was a national bank and the other was a State bank. I found in the national bank—remember, in a purely farming community—no manufacturing and no industry aside from agriculture—I found that bank had on deposit of farmers' money, $225,000. I went across the street and visited the State bank and found that there they had a deposit from the farmers of that region amounting to $85,000. There were in these two banks in that small town, located away out on the plains, within a hundred miles of the Colorado line, deposits from farmers of that region amounting to $310,000, showing the thrift and prosperity of that section of the country that a few years ago was considered worthless excepting for grazing purposes.

The other variety of wheat the Secretary introduced was the variety known as "karkov," which is a species of winter wheat and very similar to what is known as "turkey-red wheat." It is extensively grown in my section of the country. Turkey red was a Russian variety first introduced in Kansas by the Russian immigrants, who brought the seed with them from their native land. Little attention was paid to it until the Department discovered its importance. Kharkov wheat is closely related to the Turkey red wheat; in fact, you can scarcely tell the two apart.

Their introduction has, perhaps, brought a hundred times as much wealth to the farmers of the Middle West as the cost of this whole Department from the beginning. Ten years ago there was practically no winter wheat grown in Nebraska. We could not get a variety that would withstand our severe winters. Farmers practically gave up trying to raise winter wheat in that section, thinking that we were too far north to be able to grow it. In the past ten years a complete change has come about. Last year for every 1 bushel of spring wheat grown in Nebraska I think I could safely say 100 bushels of winter wheat were grown. I simply mention this to illustrate the value in dollars and cents this great Department has brought to the farmers of the country. When Secretary Wilson took up the study of the conditions existing in the spring-wheat States of the Northwest, he went at it from a different point of view. He sent expert plant pathologists and soil chemists into these States, and by careful study of the soil and the methods of wheat culture he has reached a solution of the problem that in the next ten years will produce as marked results in the spring-wheat States of the Northwest as he has wrought in the semiarid regions and the winter-wheat areas to which I have just referred.

The soil physicists and the plant pathologists have discovered that the soil of these Northwestern States has not become exhausted, and that by the introduction of improved cultural methods just as good wheat can be grown in this area as was produced twenty or twenty-five years ago. The continual growing of wheat year after year on these soils has produced a peculiar condition. The soil physicists seem to have demonstrated beyond possibility of contradiction that the continual growing of one crop on any particular soil does not exhaust the plant food of the soil. They seem to be able to prove that the roots of the plant as it draws its food from the soil gives off an excrement that is poisonous to the plant itself. Unless this poisonous matter is destroyed the soil becomes infected so badly that it becomes impossible to grow the same plant in this particular soil at all. The soil physicists have discovered that as the roots of the plant draw their food from the soil they give off a poisonous excrement that is similar to the poisonous or filthy excrement that passes from the human being as a result of the process of digestion. It bears the same relation to plant life that the kidneys bear to man. You clog a man's kidneys for forty-eight hours, thus preventing him from excreting the poisonous matter from the food he takes into his body, and it is sure to produce death.

The soil physicists have discovered also that the plant food is always present in the soil, only the plant is unable to make use of it when the soil becomes surcharged with this poisonous matter. Just as in the animal, its power to digest food is present so long as food is taken into the stomach, but unless it can excrete the poisonous matter from the body death is certain. Likewise, unless the poisonous substance can be removed from the soil, it will in time produce death to the plant, just as the stoppage of a man's kidneys will, in a briefer time, produce death. The soil physicists and the plant pathologists, working hand in hand, have discovered a solution of this question. By experiments they have demonstrated that by the application of fertilizers or by the rotation of crops or seeding the land to alfalfa, clover, timothy, or some other grass, thus giving it a rest for three or four years, this poisonous matter will soon die for lack of nourishment. These same scientists have discovered that the poisonous matter excreted by the roots of the growing wheat plant is different from the excrement discharged by the growing corn plant, and that the poisonous matter given off by one has no effect upon the other.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. POLLARD. Just a question.

Mr. GOULDEN. Have they tried both the rotation of crops and the fertilizer at the same time?

Mr. POLLARD. Yes; they have done that, and they find that particularly in this area of country the rotation of crops produces even better results than the application of fertilizer. Not only that, but the farmer saves the price of his fertilizer, and by continuous growth of other crops he gets the same return for his investment and his soil is refertilized and it is brought back to its virgin state.

Mr. GOULDEN. I do not think the gentleman understood the question. I meant if both had been tried, both the rotation of crops and fertilizing, at the same time, and what was the effect, and was it found that it was really necessary in order to bring about the best results in the way of crops? I ask this because, being a practical farmer myself, I want to know something about it. I say frankly that on the farms I have the honor of cultivating we do both.

Mr. POLLARD. If the gentlemna will please pardon me, I do not care to have him make any statements. I am limited in my time and I have a great deal of ground to cover.

Mr. GOULDEN. Oh, Mr Chairman, I asked the question in good faith.

Mr. POLLARD. If I had time, I would be glad to let the gentleman proceed, but he knows that over on his side of the House there is one gentleman who will object to an extension of time.

They have experimented with both methods, and while I say both are effective, yet the rotation of crops seems to produce the best results. It is certainly better for the farmer, because it costs him nothing excepting the cost of the seed that he plants.

As a result of these investigations and these discoveries the Agricultural Department is in a position now to give the farmers of this great area scientific and practical advice as to how to increase the production of their farms. When the results of these discoveries were laid before the Secretary he at once saw the necessity of the introduction of a new crop into this region in order to rotate with wheat; consequently he sent one of his best-trained experts to northern Russia, and he has brought back and introduced a very hardy species of alfalfa which is able to withstand the extreme cold of this area. In this bill we have made provision for the purchase of a great quantity of this seed to distribute among the farmers of this region. If this new hardy variety of alfalfa will do for the Northwest what alfalfa has done for my section of the country, it will revolutionize agriculture in that region. While this work is too new for us to make any estimate of its value yet, I believe that in the next ten years it will produce as beneficial and profitable results as followed the introduction of Durum, Turkey red, and Karkhov wheat.

The Government to-day is maintaining experimental farms in the semiarid regions of the West. Investigations are being made of cultural methods that are best adapted for conservation of what little moisture is given to the soil. New crops are sure to be introduced that are adapted to that region—drought-resistant sorghum, Kaffir corn, Durum wheat—and a cold and drought resistant alfalfa has been secured from Siberia which gives promise of great value. Millions of acres of land will be cultivated in that region that would have been a physical impossibility ten years ago. This condition has been brought about entirely by the introduction of these new crops and improved cultural methods that have been introduced by the Agricultural Department. While these investigations have not been completed, yet they have reached a point where it is clearly demonstrated that within the next few years this great section of the country that was characterized by John C. Fremont as the great American desert and only ten years ago was thought to be worthless except for grazing purposes is sure to be brought under the plow and will make homes for millions of people.

Another line of work in which investigations are being carried on with promise of great value is the development by breeding of a new variety of wheat that will be rust resistant. Experts of the Department have been engaged in investigations of this character for several years, and they are encouraged to believe that their efforts will be crowned with success. Rust is a species of fungus that affects the wheat at about the time it begins to fill. It draws all the nutrition from the stalk, thus preventing the development and filling out of the kernel. I have seen wheat fields at the time they were in blossom that gave promise of a yield of from 25 to 35 bushels per acre. A week of hot, rainy weather setting in would practically destroy the whole field, cutting down the yield from 5 to 10 bushels per acre. By selection and breeding the Department has endeavored to produce a variety of wheat that will be rust resistant. If this can be done, it will add millions of dollars to the wealth of the farmers of the wheat regions of the country every year. Investigations have also been carried on looking to the improvement of the standard of quality and the yield of corn by plant breeding and proper cultural methods.

It has been demonstrated that the yield of corn can in this way be increased from 15 to 30 per cent. The live-stock interests of the country have made great progress in the development of the various strains of cattle, hogs, and sheep. By recognized methods of selection they have produced a type of Durham and Hereford cattle that have raised the standards of these breeds very materially. The work of breeding and improving strains of live stock has been carried on for years, with the result that there are found on American farms to-day some of the finest herds of pure-bred stock that there is in the world. Until recently very little attention has been given to the question of improving the yield or quality of our grains. It appears that all kinds of plant life respond much more readily to improvement by breeding and selection than is found in animal life. The Washington Department of Agriculture, the various State experiment stations, and a few leading corn growers of the country have discovered that by applying simple methods of breeding and selection that it is possible to develop an ear of corn that will be true to type and of a very high standard of quality.

The Department of Agriculture here in Washington and the State experiment stations have made great progress in the last few years in introducing these methods of improving our cereal crops. The Washington Department has perhaps done more toward introducing these improved methods than all of the State stations combined by the distribution of farmers' bulletins and the carrying on of cooperative demonstration work through the agricultural experiment stations and with individual farmers.

Another line of investigation carried on by the Bureau of Plant Industry is the study of all kinds of diseases of plants and fruits. Insect and fungus pests that attack our cereal and plant crop cause the destruction of millions of dollars' worth of fruit and grain annually. A very careful study has been made of the causes and methods of controlling apple scab, apple bitter rot, black rot, and leaf spot. It is estimated that these diseases cause a loss of $10,000,000 annually. Effective remedies have been discovered for combating these diseases. Information concerning the methods of controlling these diseases has been scattered broadcast over the country through bulletins and demonstration experiments.

I see my time is going very rapidly. I did desire to continue this discussion somewhat longer. I had planned to refer to the experiments which have been made in the development of a species of wheat that will be rust resistant. That is of inestimable value to the whole wheat-growing region of the United States. I desired also to discuss at some length the investigations that have been made along the line of producing cotton that will be wilt resistant, the cotton boll weevil investigations, their studies in tobacco, and various other lines of endeavor, but I find I will have to pass over that, and I will ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks that portion of my speech.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for the purpose indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POLLARD. A study of the organism causing pear blight has resulted in a discovery of a method to control this disease.

Pear blight has almost destroyed the pear-growing industry of the United States, all our choice varieties being very susceptible to pear blight. This industry is valued at $15,000,000 annually in California alone. Statistics show that almost one-third of the orchards of that State have been destroyed by this disease. It is believed, however, that the new methods introduced by the Department of Agriculture will result in saving the remainder of the orchards.

The investigation of the causes of wilt in sea island and upland cotton has resulted in the discovery of a method of controlling this disease. The plant pathologists have introduced a new variety that resists the ravages of this pest. I might mention other investigations that have been conducted along similar lines, but I have said enough to indicate the importance and character of this work and its value to the country.

In 1867 the Commissioner of Agriculture began investigating the sugar-beet question. During that year eight varieties of sugar beets were grown on the Department grounds in Washington, and nine varieties were sent to Illinois for trial. The sugar content of these first varieties that were tested varied from 7 to 8 per cent. During the same year a study was made to outline the area of the country that was best adapted to sugar-beet culture. In 1869 two publications were issued by the Commissioner of Agriculture discussing the methods of sugar-beet culture in Europe, which resulted in an early introduction of sugar-beet seed into this country. During that year and 1870, three sugar-beet factories were built in the United States—one each in Illinois, California, and Wisconsin. The growth of the sugar-beet industry has been gradual until the present time. The Department of Agriculture has been rendering assistance in developing this industry, except during the administraton of Secretary Morton. Secretary Morton suspended sugar-beet investigations in 1893. Immediately upon assuming the duties of his office in 1897 Secretary Wilson resumed the study of this question. Cooperative work has been carried on by the State experiment stations, which has aided very materially the success of this industry.

To-day there are sixty-four sugar-beet factories in the United States with a combined annual output of approximately 1,000,000,000 pounds of sugar, the raw product bringing to the farmers of the country an annual revenue of over $20,000,000. As a result of the study of this question in the last ten years by the Department of Agriculture we are now able to produce a very considerable amount of sugar-beet seed. Until the last few years all the sugar-beet seed for planting the fields has been imported. It is thought that within a short time enough sugar-beet seed will be grown in the United States to supply the entire demand of American sugar-beet growers. As a result of the study of this question by the Department of Agriculture and the State experiment stations the sugar content of the beet has been very materially increased. In some sections of the country best adapted to sugar-beet culture the sugar content of the beet has reached as high as 20 per cent. Under new cultural methods introduced by the Department of Agriculture the yield and the sugar content of the beet is being gradually increased. This is an industry that was first introduced by the Department of Agriculture in 1867 and has now become one of the staple farm crops of the country.

The results of the investigations of the cotton and rice industries of the South, the tobacco industry of the North and South Atlantic States, has produced results equally as startling as is shown in other lines of research in this Department. The United States Department of Agriculture went into Texas a few years ago when the cotton boll weevil threatened the whole cotton industry of that State. By propagating new varieties of cotton and introducing improved cultural methods the cotton crop has been saved to that State. Quarantine lines have been established, preventing the spread of this disease that held the whole cotton industry of the South in jeopardy. Doctor Knapp, who has been in direct charge of this work in the South, told the Agricultural Committee that thousands of farms were abandoned in Texas on account of the ravages of this pest. Since the Department took charge of this work, however, farmers have returned to their farms, and under the guiding hand of Mr. Knapp they are now able to raise a better strain of cotton in spite of the boll weevil than they were before this pest was first visited upon that State.

The results that have followed the cooperative demonstration work in the cotton fields of the South is indeed marvelous. These new resistant strains of cotton and improved cultural methods have been introduced upon hundreds of thousands of farms in the South. The Department has succeeded in introducing new crops to serve in rotating with cotton. The cotton planter of the South has been taught the importance of diversified agriculture. The beneficial results that have followed the Department's entrance into this section of the country is worth millions of dollars to the cotton-growing industry of the South.

The Department's experts have introduced from Japan new varieties of rice along with new cultural methods that have simply revolutionized the rice industry of the South. When the Agricultural Department took up this work they actually found farmers working in the rice fields of the Carolinas with boots on their horses to enlarge their feet so as to prevent them from sinking too far in the mud as they tilled their crops. After a careful study of the methods of rice culture at home and abroad, the Department has introduced methods of rice culture that is similar to the methods employed in raising wheat in the Western States.

Under the old method the sowing was done with a drill, the rice was hoed by hand and cut with a reap hook. One man was capable of taking care of but 1 or 2 acres. Under the improved methods introduced by the Department of Agriculture the gang plow and the disk harrow and the broadcast seeder have been brought into use. The rice is cut with a twine binder and thrashed with a steam thrasher. One man can cultivate about as much rice under these new improved methods as one man can cultivate in wheat in the North.

Tobacco investigations were begun by the Department in 1898. As a result of these investigations by the Department their experts have taught the tobacco growers how to ferment the tobacco leaf properly. The introduction of these improved methods of fermenting the tobacco leaf has resulted in saving at least $1,000,000 a year to the tobacco growers. The plant pathologists have introduced new methods of seed selection which has resulted in a very material improvement in the quality of the tobacco. The Department has produced two improved strains of wrapper tobacco for planting in Florida and Connecticut, known as the "Uncle Sam Sumatra" and the "Hazelwood Cuban." These new strains are worth from 15 to 20 per cent more than any other tobacco on the market.

I might continue a discussion of the new plants that have been introduced by the Department and improved cultural methods they have inaugurated which have resulted in enriching the farmers of the country by hundreds of millions of dollars. I think, however, I have continued this review far enough to indicate to this committee clearly that the expenditures in the Department of Agriculture have brought results. This great Department, in cooperation with the State experiment stations all over the country, has been able to make two blades of grass grow where only one was grown when they took up this work.

I can not leave this subject without saying a word about the man at the head of this great Department, who has done so much toward the advancement of the science of agriculture. Secretary Wilson is a specimen of the hardy, thrifty, determined frontiersman. When he came into this Department he brought with him the same industry, the same foresight, the same business sagacity, and the same skill that he carried with him when he went out on the frontier in Iowa and helped to make that State one of the greatest States in the Union. During the eleven years he has been Secretary of Agriculture he has done more toward elevating the American farmer, giving to him the poise and dignity that is his due, than all of his predecessors combined.

His keen, watchful eye has followed every expert, whether he was exploring the steppes of Russia, the fertile valleys of Japan, the cold, barren regions of Siberia, or whether he was conducting investigations in the cotton fields of the South, in the wheat fields of the Northwest, in the tobacco fields of Connecticut, or on the stock ranches in the great West. His great heart has been the motive power that has given force and energy and success to all these various lines of investigations and research. In Secretary Wilson the farmers of the country, yea the whole people of the country, owe a debt of gratitude that they can never repay. By the reduction to practical application the science of agriculture he has built for himself a monument that will be as enduring as time itself.

I wish to divert your attention for a moment to a comparison of the part the two great political parties have taken in this great work. As I said at the opening of my remarks the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture was passed during the Administration of Abraham Lincoln, the first President the Republican party gave to the country. In all, thirty laws have been passed bearing on the question of agriculture since 1862. Of these laws just three came from the hands of the Democratic party.

Every one of the other twenty-seven laws were enacted by the Republican party; consequently this marvelous development and growth of the Department of Agriculture and the beneficial results that have gone out to the people are the result of Republican ingenuity, Republican forethought, and Republican statesmanship. It was the Republican party that gave to the country the organic act creating the Department. It was under Republican legislation that the investigation of animal and plant diseases was begun. It was the result of Republican legislation that the beet-sugar industry, the durum and Turkey red wheat, alfalfa, and improved strains of rice, cotton, and tobacco were given to the country. It was Republican legislation that opened the great semiarid regions of the West to settlement. It was by Republican legislation that the irrigation of the arid lands has been introduced. In this magnificent work the great Republican party has known no North, no South, no East, no West. All parts of the country have felt the beneficial results of its statesmanship.

The Republican party entered into that section of the country that since the rebellion has done everything in its power to obstruct and block the progress of not only our party, but of the nation. We went into the cotton fields of the South and taught the poor cotton planter how to grow cotton and rice. We showed him how to combat the cotton boll weevil. We have carried on a system almost akin to wet nursing in our efforts to teach him how to grow cotton and rice at a profit. This very bill carries an appropriation of $250,000 for combating Texas fever, which is wholly confined to the South. We have produced results equally beneficial in the tobacco fields of Connecticut, Virginia, West Virginia, and Kentucky; in fact, all sections of the country have been beneficiaries of the growth of this great Department as a result of Republican statesmanship.

I wish to call your attention for a few moments to a comparison of the growth of agriculture on the farms during Democratic and Republican Administrations. I will only elaborate upon a few of the leading crops.

I find that during the Administration of President Harrison the average annual acreage of corn was 74,280,396 acres. The average annual yield of corn during his Administration was 1,822,870,000 bushels. The average annual price per bushel on the 1st day of December was 39.7 cents. During the Cleveland Administration the average acreage and yield was practically the same as during the Harrison Administration, but the value of the crop was $162,000,000 less in round numbers. The average annual price per bushel was 7½ cents less per bushel. During the McKinley and Roosevelt Administrations the average annual acreage increased to almost 88,000,000 acres. The average annual production amounted to 2,240,634,463 bushels. The average annual value was $869,575,309. The average annual price per bushel was 38.9 cents. I find that the value of the corn crop during the last year of the Harrison Administration was 6.8 per cent greater than it was during the first year of his Administration. I find that during the last year of the Cleveland Administration the value of the corn crop actually decreased 16 per cent from what it was during the first year of his Administration.

I find that the total value of the corn crop for the year 1907 was 75 per cent greater than it was during the first year of the McKinley Administration. These figures represent the average annual price on the farm on the 1st day of December during these Administrations. A close examination of these figures discloses the fact that during the year 1894, which was the year and the drought prevailed over a large portion of the corn-growing section of the country, the total production of corn was 1,212,770,000 bushels, being the smallest crop grown since 1881. The average price of corn for that year for the United States on the 1st day of December was 45.7 cents per bushel. The next year there was grown the largest corn crop ever produced up until that time. There was an increase over the year 1894 of almost 1,000,000,000 bushels, and the price dropped to 25 cents per bushel. One big crop following a very light crop in a Democratic Administration brought the average price of corn down for the whole country from 45.7 cents to 25.3 cents per bushel. The next year, 1896, another tremendous crop of corn was grown, being in excess of the great crop grown in 1895 by about 130,000,000 bushels.

The price that year dropped to 21.5 cents per bushel as an average throughout the United States on the 1st day of December. With over a billion more bushels of corn grown in 1896 than in 1894, the value of the crop was $60,000,000 less. Now, let us see what took place during the Republican administrations that followed. In the next year, 1897, which was the first year of the McKinley Administration, the total production of corn was 1,902,000,000 bushels, in round numbers, which was about 380,000,000 bushels less than was grown the year before; the price increased from 21.5 to 26.3 cents per bushel. From the first year of the McKinley Administration on down to the year 1900 there has been almost a continuous increase in the production of corn, reaching for the year 1906, 3,000,000,000 bushels, being by far the largest crop ever grown in the United States. During all this period the price of corn increased in almost the same proportion as the yield. During the Democratic Administration of Grover Cleveland one short crop of corn brought the price up to 25 cents per bushel. Two large crops reduced the price to 21 cents per bushel. The beginning of the McKinley Administration followed two large crops of corn.

Thereafter the production of corn not only increased for one year, but for ten, and instead of the price going down with one big crop, as it did with the Cleveland Administration, the price soared higher and higher until it reached the maximum in 1901, when the average price of corn on the 1st day of December throughout the United States was 60 cents per bushel. The lowest average price of corn throughout the United States on the 1st day of December since 1900, just three years after the Republican party came into power, was 39.9 per bushel, which was the 3,000,000,000-bushel crop in 1906.

I have a number of tables here bearing on this same question which I desire to insert at this point, which the House has kindly permitted. I wish to read briefly from them. I find that of the great staple crops grown on the farm during the Cleveland Administration, such as corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, potatoes, hay, tobacco, and cotton, during the first year of the Cleveland Administration the total value of all these crops was $2,034,000,000 in round numbers, and in the year 1894 the value was $1,917,000,000; in 1895, $1,757,000,000; and in 1896, $1,748,000,000, showing that for the four years of the Cleveland Administration there was a gradual decline each year in the value of these great staple crops of the farms. I also find that in the live-stock interests of the country, including horses, cattle, mules, sheep, swine, in fact all of the other animals that compose our live-stock interests.

In the year 1893 they were worth $2,443,000,000. There was a gradual reduction each year until the close of the Cleveland Administration, when the value was $1,727,000,000, a falling off of $700,000,000 in value during that period.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. POLLARD. For a question.

Mr. RUCKER. I will ask you if the figures do not show that the average price of all the great crops was considerably less during the last ten years than the prior ten years?

Mr. POLLARD. On the contrary, the facts show the opposite to be the case.

Mr. RUCKER. Well——

Mr. POLLARD. I can not yield for the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. RUCKER. I beg your pardon. I wanted to see whether there were two classes of statistics which this Department was furnishing.

Mr. POLLARD. I did not understand your statement.

Mr. RUCKER. Under your assumption and your statement as to the facts, I say that the Government must be furnishing two sets of statistics, because I can produce their statistics that are different from those you quote.

Mr. POLLARD. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. LAMB. Will the gentleman yield to me for just a question?

Mr. POLLARD. Only a question.

Mr. LAMB. Do you wish to leave the impression on the country that that falling off was due to the fact that Cleveland was President?

Mr. POLLARD. I will discuss that later on when I reach it. I will go into that matter very fully if I have the time.

These figures prove conclusively to my mind that so far as the great agricultural interests of the country are concerned the people are infinitely better off during a Republican than during a Democratic administration. During the last few days we have heard a great deal said about the condition of the farmer. Our Democratic friends have been bemoaning his plight since this little stock gamblers' panic struck the country. The agricultural products of the United States for the last year under panic prices, as you choose to call them, were worth almost as much as they were during the whole Administration of Grover Cleveland. Our Democratic friends on the other side of the aisle need not become exercised about the condition of the farmer. With the exception of two or three weeks when this gamblers' panic first made its appearance, at which time there was no market at all for any farm products simply because the banks would not give out any money to pay for the crops, the farmers have not felt the effect of the panic. You take it out in the great agricultural sections of the country, and if the farmers of that region did not read the daily papers they would never know there had been a panic.

At the close of eleven years of Republican administration we find that the country has produced the third largest crop of corn in our history, being exceeded only in the years 1905 and 1906. The total production of corn for the year 1907 was 2,592,326,000 bushels, and the average price throughout the country on the 1st day of December was 51.6 cents per bushel. Here we find ourselves in the midst of a Republican panic, as the Democrats choose to call it. In the face of this awful panic, that has brought devastation and ruin to the homes of the people, according to Democratic authority, the total value of the production of all the farms in the United States is the greatest in our history—10 per cent greater than the record-breaking crop of 1906, 17 per cent in excess of the crop of 1905, 20 per cent greater than the crop of 1904, 57 per cent greater than the crop of 1899, and 100 per cent greater than for the last year of Cleveland's Administration. The total production of all the farms of the United States for the last calendar year was $7,412,000,000. This is $657,000,000 more than the value of the crop of 1906, and this, gentlemen of the committee, in the midst of a Republican panic.

If such conditions as these are what follow Republican panics, so far as the farmer is concerned we had better let the panic continue than take any chances of having a change of administration and a return to the times of soup houses under the Cleveland Administration.

For the first time in our history the exports of farm products exceeded a billion dollars in value. I fully realize that Providence has been kind to the country under our administration. We are willing to admit that Providence has been on our side. I have never heard anyone suggest that Providence ever worked with the Democratic party. Yes; Providence has given us the warm sunshine and the bounteous rain that has helped to swell the production of our farms, yet, if we were to follow the precedent established in the Cleveland Administration, a bounteous production of our farms would mean low prices and low values for everything the farmer has to sell. How is it that this is not the case under a Republican administration? How is it that a large acreage and an abundant harvest during a Democratic administration brings cheap prices for farm crops and under a Republican administration the same conditions are followed by higher prices and exorbitant values for farm products?

To my mind the explanation is simple. When the people awoke on the morning following the election in November, 1892, and realized that the country had gone Democratic, that very morning retrenchment set in all over the country, factories were either closed or began running on short hours. Yes; the panic of 1893 began during the closing hours of Harrison's Administration, but it did not come until it was known a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress had been elected, pledged to give the people free trade. Laboring men were thrown out of employment. Mr. Gompers has said that in the year 1893 there were 3,000,000 able-bodied men in the United States, most of whom had families to support, who were seeking employment in vain. This condition not only continued throughout the year 1893, but the same conditions prevailed during the whole of the Cleveland Administration. How different was the situation when the Republican party was returned to power. When the people awoke on that bright morning in November, 1896, and the news was flashed from one end of the country to the other that McKinley had been elected President the country was full of sunshine. The little birds even were singing sweeter songs than they had ever sung before. The fires were rekindled in the furnaces. The factories once more became hives of industry. The spindles began to turn, and the laboring men went back to work on full time.

The Republican party had been in power for hardly a year when all of these 3,000,000 men who had been seeking employment found more than they could do. The factories all over the country began to expand and new ones sprang up here and there like magic. The demand for labor grew year after year, and we found the condition where there were two jobs awaiting every man that wanted work. The day laborers were all at work at good wages; they were eating three good square meals a day. They were eating the choicest cuts of beef, veal, mutton, and pork. They were buying pianos and other comforts for the home. They were consuming farm products of every description, building up a great home market for the products of the farm. Under the stimulus of the Dingley tariff that we have heard so much about our country has reached the highest degree of prosperity in all lines of industry ever known. It is this great home market that has been built up since the Republican party came back into power, under the Dingley Act, that has made the farmer prosper as he has never prospered before and to even revel in luxury.

The total production last year of all our farms, of all our factories, of all our mines, and of all our forests reached $27,000,000,000 in value. Our total exports were worth $1,750,000,000. Our total imports were worth $1,250,000,000, leaving a balance of trade in our favor of $500,000,000. Gentlemen, this means that the total value of the American market was worth $26,500,000,000. The total value of the international commerce of all the nations of the world last year was $20,000,000,000. This great American market of ours, that has grown up under the Dingley tariff act, was worth six and a half billion dollars in excess of the entire international commerce of the world. Is it any wonder that the farmer is prosperous when he has such a market as this in which to sell his goods? And I want to say to my friends on the other side of the House that the farmers of the West are interested in a revision of the tariff. Yes; we are in favor of a revision of the tariff, but when that tariff is revised, I want to say to you that the farmers of the country are going to see to it that the party is in power that will revise it along protective lines. The farmer will insist that this great home market is not interfered with.

In the platform adopted by the Democratic party in Omaha a few days ago, which, it is said, was written by the Hon. William J. Bryan, my distinguished constituent, there is a plank committing the Democratic party to tariff for revenue only. What is a tariff for revenue only? A tariff for revenue only is a tariff that is placed on noncompeting articles. Mr. Bryan has said time and time again that a protective tariff is highway robbery. A protective tariff, he tell us, takes the money out of one man's pocket and places it in another's. If this is true and the Democrats are put in power one year hence, it means that they will enact a tariff law, if they are true to their pledges, without any element of protection in it, for their great leader has said that a protective tariff is robbery. What does this mean, gentlemen? It simply means that over 50 per cent of the articles that are now on the free list will be transferred to the dutiable list. Under the present tariff law over 50 per cent of our imports come in free of duty. Practically all the commodities, with the exception of sugar, that are classed among the necessaries of life are on the free list. A large per cent of the duties collected on our imports come from the luxuries of life.

If we are to take the Democratic party at their word, and they come to enact a tariff law, 80 per cent of the duties will be on the necessaries of life. Not only that, but by tearing down the protective tariff they will permit the goods produced by the cheap foreign labor to come into competition with the goods produced by our high-priced American labor. This means that the wages of the American laborer must be reduced to a corresponding level with those of his brother laborers across the sea. The laboring men of the country will either have to submit to a reduction in their wages of from 50 to 100 per cent or there will be thousands thrown out of employment. In either event it means that this great home market of ours will be destroyed. This great home market that is worth $27,000,000,000 and furnishes a market for the products of the American farm will be opened to the products of the cheap foreign labor. I want to say to you that the farmers of the country will never tolerate such conditions as that. [Applause.] The American farmer is deeply interested in the factories and in the mines and in the forests of the country.

The farmer knows that he furnishes the food for the men who work in the factories, in the mines, and in the forests.

He knows that unless the factory hands, the miners, and the foresters work at good wages all the time they can not consume the maximum of food products. The farmer knows that if a tariff law is enacted stripped of protection, it will close 75 per cent of the factories of the country; that hundreds of thousands of men will be thrown out of employment. He knows that the moment these factories close and these men are out of employment his market is interfered with. The farmers of the country know that it is this great home market that is responsible for high prices for farm products. I want to say to you that the farmers of the country will never permit this great home market to be interfered with by the Democratic party.

Gentlemen, I have too much faith in the good sense and the good judgment of the American laboring man, the American farmer, and the American business man to think that they will consider for a moment the advisability of electing a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress. The laboring people, the farmers, and the business men of the country have great confidence in the grand old Republican party, and I want to say to you that the future of our party was never more propitious or gave promise of greater success in all our history than it does to-day. When the Ides of next November arrive and the result of the Presidential election is flashed over the country we will have a guaranty of four more years of Republican rule and prosperous times. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POLLARD. I should like to ask leave to continue my remarks fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). The Chair will state that the time for general debate has been limited by order of the House. The committee can by unanimous consent extend the time of the gentleman from Nebraska. It can not extend the four hours fixed by the House. The Chair will put the request. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to have his time extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. LAMB. If it does not come out of the time on our side, I shall not object; but if it does, I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The order of the House made no distinction as to side, but only as to four hours for general debate.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are several others who desire to participate in debate on this side, and as I have already been given the right to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I will withdraw my request for an extension of time. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a petition to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from the Headquarters Memorial and Executive Committee of the City of Buffalo, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, in relation to the matter of abolishing the pension agencies in the United States. The petition is in opposition to the action of this House. I desire to add to that that it meets with my most cordial approval.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The petition is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS MEMORIAL AND EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
DEPARTMENT OF NEW YORK, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Buffalo, N. Y., March 7, 1908.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

The above-named committee, composed of delegates representing all the Grand Army posts of said city, Encampment No. 97, Union Veteran Legion, E. L. Hayward and Chaplain P. G. Cook Camp Sons of Veterans, General D. S. Stanley Garrison Army and Navy Union, and Budd Naval Veteran Association, earnestly protest against the passage of the bill to abolish all the pension agencies except the one at Washington, for the alleged purpose of economy or business reasons.

The pension agency system was established for the convenience of the pensioners, and in our judgment great inconvenience, annoyance, and delay will result to the pensioners if this proposition should become a law. We have no hesitation in saying that the pension agency system is entirely satisfactory to the pensioners. It is our firm conviction that such proposed legislation will inflict great hardship upon our comrades, their widows, and other dependents, because of delays in receiving their checks promptly and for other reasons. "Not a day passes that some inquiry is not made at the agencies, some lost paper asked for or to be replaced, some error sought to be corrected, or a request for a new voucher." These letters and requests receive prompt attention. It is safe to say that there are received at the eighteen agencies at least 25,000 defective vouchers each quarter to be returned for correction, making 100,000 for the year. There would certainly be a long delay in these cases and many of our comrades would be "camping on the other side before they could get their checks in hand." The present method of payment of pensions is the result of many years' experience and study, with a view of considering the convenience of the pensioners, at the same time conserving the interests of the Government; that familiarity with the present agency system results in the prompt payment of pensioners, to the mutual satisfaction of pensioners and the Government. The matter of economy, however, is of trifling importance compared with the inconveniences and annoyances our pensioners would be submitted to by the removal of all the agencies to Washington.

When the present agency system was established there were only 232,000 pensioners on the rolls; disbursements only $30,000,000. Now there are nearly a million pensioners on the rolls and the disbursements the next fiscal year will be over $160,000,000.

The welfare of these wards of the nation requires the present agency system more than ever before, and the fact that those interested in retaining the present force in the Pension Bureau at Washington on the false plea of economy are willing to sacrifice the convenience of the pensioners to gain their end, ought to be potent in defeating the scheme.

Even if business methods and economy are desired instead of patriotism and appreciation of the veterans, let them reduce their force in the Pension Bureau by abolishing their high-salaried clerkships, and keep their low-salaried clerkships in the pension agencies to do the work.

Very respectfully, yours,

HENRY J. MESSING, President.

JOHN J. GRAVES, Secretary.

We are in hearty accord with the above statement.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, after the death of Washington two intellectual giants, hostile and implacable, towered above the cradle of the infant Republic. They have fixed the attention of succeeding generations, and after the lapse of a century loom before us mountainlike. Reposing on each lofty peak is a temple, the object of the admiration of its votaries and the anathema of its foes. They are the Ebal and Gerizim of all history. One was called Alexander Hamilton and the other Thomas Jefferson—each the antithesis of the other and each in himself a startling paradox. I shall endeavor to give an authentic account of the character of the one and the services of the other.

Jefferson, to the manor born, lapped in luxury, wealth, and ease; cultured, refined, sensitive, tracing his proud lineage back through centuries of heroic and heralded ancestry, became the great apostle of the people and the savior of the oppressed.

Hamilton, at the beginning of the Revolution, appears in New York, a stranger—an obscure West Indian, his past wrapped in mystery, yea in shadow—and he becomes the champion of caste, the defender of privilege; forgetting his humble origin, he disdains the ladder by which he rose, and lives and dies with a sovereign contempt for his kind. Strange man, strange paradox!

Hamilton was in a way the result of his early West Indian environment. No amount of genius or learning ever eradicates the indelible stamp of our age and nationality. No man can escape it. Aristotle was a Greek in the same sense that the humblest citizen of Athens was a Greek. Cæsar was as essentially a Roman as the poorest legionary who followed him. Hamilton at the beginning of the hostilities was not a citizen of the United States. He was an alien; for that reason no character in the history of the world is as little understood. He was an enigma to his contemporaries; a thing apart, solitary and alone; he is as little understood now. It was a moral and mental impossibility that Hamilton should commend the form of government that was being framed or comprehend the character of the people who constituted it.

The Constitution is not the pure product either of Jefferson's or Madison's or Hamilton's thought. It is not framed as an architect designs a building. It is not the creature of some man's dreams; the genius of the great and constructive statesman is not employed in the invention of some new form of government, or the designing of an original fabric, which the people are induced to accept. He finds conditions, he adapts the best possible government to those conditions, which he can neither change nor alter.

The conditions that faced Jefferson and Hamilton and Madison were not of their making. They were of God's eternal ordination. Two motives, two purposes, filled the hearts of all the colonists alike. One was the formation of a more perfect Union which should protect them from all the world on the one hand and the eternal preservation of the autonomy of the States on the other. This double purpose filled the hearts of Adams and of Jefferson alike. Adams was a citizen of Massachusetts, with all the prejudices of his Puritan forebears. Jefferson was a citizen of Virginia, with all the prejudices of his cavalier ancestry. They met, each the citizen of a separate State. Massachusetts and Virginia and New York, each having been for a century a separate colony, were brought together, not by any affinity of laws, of customs, or of religion, but by the iron hand of necessity and by the menace of a common danger, and they carried into this confederation all their ancient prejudices. Hamilton alone never understood this, because he could not. He had never been a citizen of this country. To him it was a compact nation. It was impossible that he should enter into those things that were the results not of men's reason, but of men's experience. You to-day, expatriated from your country, may become a citizen of Germany, a loyal and patriotic citizen of Germany, but you can never enter into the prejudices which separate the Hapsburgs from the Hohenzollerns, because neither your interest, your prejudices, nor your pride run back into the period in which those royal houses had their origin. Hamilton had no preference among these various colonies, for the reason that he had never been a citizen of any of them. His dead were not buried here; he dreamed not of the States that were, but of the nation that was to be. He knew nothing of the traditions or the trials of the colonists who had inhabited this continent for a hundred years. Their local pride was to him a narrow provincialism; he could neither comprehend nor tolerate the stubborn contention of the colonies for the eternal preservation of an inviolate autonomy.

For that reason he was a puzzle to his contemporaries. Start with the strange, brilliant youth, the mysterious and commanding boy who appears suddenly and unheralded to thrill and dominate the amazed multitude assembled upon the commons.

The insignificance of that little volcanic knoll upon which Hamilton was born saved it from the notice or the oppression of Great Britain. The tiny island of Nevis, with its 20 square miles and its 10,000 inhabitants, never dreamed of rebellion to the mother country. Had it been oppressed, resistance was too impossible for serious consideration.

Hamilton admits that upon his arrival in this country he was every inch a loyalist, reared among a people ardently attached to the English Government; his highest ideals of human happiness and liberty were formed from the study of the common law and the history of the feudal system; for that reason he lived and died a monarchist pure and simple.

Mature and precocious far beyond his years, he arrived in New York, in a city wild with excitement, eagerly panting for freedom. Ten years of tyranny had killed every emotion of loyalty to the mother country or reverence for an imbecile king.

He became convinced not that the British Government was a bad government, but that it had treated the colonies badly, that it had denied to them the liberties and privileges it had conferred upon the citizens of England, and the inhabitants of Nevis, and that for that reason they had a perfect right to rebel, and to establish for themselves a government of their own. When the time came to determine the form of that government Hamilton would have established a limited monarchy disguised under the form of a republic. Jefferson would have none of it. The clash was sharp and decisive between them; hostility, endless, implacable, was inevitable, because their differences were inherent, organic; they went to the very foundation of the system and permeated every fiber of the fabric which was then in process of construction, by the framers of the Constitution.

As I have said, Hamilton's highest conception of human rights were derived from a study of the feudal system and the common law. From these premises monarchy was the inevitable and irresistible conclusion. Hamilton believed—

That all power and all property originally reposed in a feudal king and his mailed marauders. Like every cultured Englishman on earth, outside of the colonies, he believed that every privilege, the most sacred and inalienable rights, were conferred; that the inestimable blessings of liberty, all come trickling down from the filthy steps of a throne upon the people below, and that the measure of freedom increased as the government in its wisdom enlarged the sphere of the citizen's freedom, or as he in his strength or cunning could command it.

The story of the slow and painful passage from an absolute to a limited monarchy is the history of a thousand years of stubborn, patient, insidious encroachment upon royal prerogative. The most sacred and inalienable rights of the Englishman are not inherent. He traces them to a royal grant. He holds them secure, it is true, but, like his lands, they are secured by musty title papers or by a stubborn adverse possession, and are traced to the Crown.

The hardy English yeomanry watched with sleepless vigilance the weakness, the folly, and the necessities of their kings, and by slow and painful degrees they usurped first the prerogatives of the barons, and, rising above the ruins of decayed and shattered feudalism, they forced concession after concession from the cupidity or the cowardice of kings. The measure of the Englishman's liberties have been grandly and nobly extended till to-day Edward the Seventh has not a modicum of the real power possessed by Theodore Roosevelt. Hamilton had studied the source and watched the growth of liberty in the mother country, and he would have established a strong central national government in the western world, and have conferred upon the citizen a constantly increasing measure of freedom as he in turn displayed his capacity to use without abusing it. Men were to derive their liberties, as they became entitled to them, from the government.

Between this philosophy and this philosopher and Thomas Jefferson there was an infinite chasm, an impassable gulf. "All men are created free and equal and have an equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," thundered the father of Democracy in that immortal declaration. Life, liberty, happiness, were not conferred by the State, they were sacred from it, they were not ours by the grace of a king, but the gift of God, inherent, inalienable, no government could confer, since it never possessed them.

The Sage of Monticello, with the audacity of genius, turned his back upon all the precedents and finespun fallacies of four thousand years of civilization. He took a man, a simple citizen, endowed him with inherent and inalienable rights, clothed him with all power and authority, crowned him with a ballot, and the trembling monarchs of the world cowered before the towering creation of this mighty American.

Independence—

can be trusted nowhere but in the people in the mass. They are inherently independent of all but the moral law.

I know of no safe depository of the ultimate powers of society but in the people themselves.

And again:

A bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth.

An organized society was formed by having this citizen confer certain authority upon officers of the law, his servants, not his masters, commissioned for a fixed time, to discharge specific duties, necessary to protect and secure him in possession of property and the enjoyment of life and liberty. The total of the authority thus conferred became the Commonwealth, when these Commonwealths, for the sake of mutual protection, "formed a more perfect union," the aggregate of the powers expressly delegated by the States, formed the Federal Government. But the fountain, the source, of all authority was the citizen. This was the cardinal principle of Jefferson's philosophy; the sovereignty of the States was but a corollary; the largest measure of individual liberty, not State rights, was the "sumnum bonum" of his whole system of government. The individual was surrounded by the precinct, or township, the county, the State, the nation, like so many concentric circles, and each in proportion of its nearness to the citizen was invested with the greatest possible jurisdiction. Each served a double purpose. It prevented the encroachment of one citizen upon the rights of another, and presented between all and the ambition of a tyrant a series of stubborn barriers, each of which must be demolished before the liberties of a people could be engulfed in a compact Federal despotism.

This plan, original and sublime in its severe simplicity, crystallized into law, became the priceless legacy of succeeding generations, "the sheet anchor of our liberties," the Constitution of the United States.

Hamilton regarded the whole system with suspicion, and at last abandoned it in utter disgust. He tells us as much himself. On February 27, 1802, he writes his old friend, Gouverneur Morris:

Mine is an odd destiny. Perhaps no man in the United States has sacrificed or done more for the present Constitution than myself; and contrary to all my anticipations of its fate, as you know, from the very beginning. I am still laboring to prop this frail and worthless fabric. Yet I have the murmurs of my friends no less than the curses of my foes for my reward. What can I do better than withdraw from the scene? Every day proves to me more and more that this American world was not made for me.

Sad, soured, solitary man, still an alien to the hour of tragic death; still turning to the old objects of his early idolatry—royalty, caste, vested privilege—the putrid political "flesh pots of Egypt."

Says Thomas Jefferson:

I invited these gentlemen (Hamilton and John Adams) and the Attorney-General, as I remember, to dine with me. * * * Conversation began on other matters, and by some circumstance was led to the British constitution, on which Adams observed: "Purge that constitution of its corruption and give to its popular branch equality of representation and it would be the most perfect constitution ever devised by the wit of man." Hamilton paused and said: "Purge it of its corruption and give to its popular branch equality of representation and it would become an impracticable government. As it stands at present, with all its supposed defects, it is the most perfect government which ever existed." * * * The one (Adams) was for two hereditary branches and an honest election; the other (Hamilton) for an hereditary King with a House of Lords and Commons corrupted to his will and standing between him and the people.

Hamilton was indeed a singular character. Of acute understanding, disinterested, honest, and honorable in all private transactions, amiable in society, and duly valuing virtue in private life, yet so bewitched and perverted by British example.

Hamilton went into the constitutional convention with these ideas in his head, and with a rough draft of a constitution in his pocket, which would infallibly have carried them into fatal effect had they been accepted even in part by his colleagues. It provided for a governor or president to be elected by the people and to serve during good behavior. Trajan and Tiberius were elected in the same way and subject to the same conditions.

A senate and assembly, the assembly to be elected by the people, senators to be chosen by electors or by the State legislatures, and to hold office during good behavior.

The governor to have an absolute veto, and then, in order that he might completely and absolutely demolish the last vestige of local self-government, or the very existence of such a thing as State governments, this sinister instrument provided:

All laws of the particular States contrary to the Constitution or laws of the United States to be utterly void. And the better to prevent such laws being passed, the governor or president of each State shall be appointed by the General Government, and shall have a negative upon the laws about to be passed by the State of which he is governor or president.

No State is to have any forces, land or naval, and the militia of all the States to be under the sole and exclusive direction of the United States, the officers of which are to be appointed and commissioned by them.

This was not a constitution, it was a snare.

"The Republican Government of France," says Jefferson, "was lost without a struggle because the party of un et indivisible had prevailed; no provincial organization existed to which the people might rally under authority of the laws, the seats of the directory were virtually vacant, and a small force sufficed to turn the legislatures out of their chambers, and to salute its leader as chief of the nation."

Such a constitution would have delighted the heart of the subtle, wily Octavianus.

"The system of Imperial government as instituted by Augustus," says Gibbon, "may be defined as an absolute monarchy disguised under the form of a Commonwealth."

Hamilton caught the trick from the crafty tyrants of antiquity.

"The masters of the Roman world surrounded their throne with darkness, concealed their irresistible strength, and humbly professed themselves the accountable ministers of the Senate, whose supreme decrees they dictated and obeyed."

There is a persistent effort to hold up the principal author of the "Federalist," as the father of the Constitution. No statement was ever more absolutely unwarranted or utterly untrue. The Federalist was not written until 1788, after the Constitution was framed and practically complete. I would not detract from the just fame of that, the greatest state paper of its kind. For terseness, lucidity and force, for transparent and invincible logic, for attractiveness of style, and for wealth of research, it has no peer or parallel. But the Federalist was never written, nor does it purport to prove that the Constitution is either the embodiment of a perfect or an ideal form of government. It performed its purpose, it met and completely answered the objections, then urged to various features and clauses of that instrument.

Hamilton believed that it was better to have the various colonies bound in a union under the Constitution than to be held as they then were under a loose confederation, or to remain separate, distinct, and dissevered sovereignties. He accepted the proposed form of government as the lesser of two evils. And he gave to this effort to bind them by what he regarded as "a frail and worthless fabric" all the force and energy of his splendid and forceful eloquence, and that lucid and inexorable logic so unrivaled in his day.

I am amazed at this renaissance of Hamilton, because Hamilton was no more a Republican than he was a Democrat. He was an autocrat, he was an aristocrat, but he had as little sympathy with Republicanism as with Democracy. He knew nothing of the vices of Republicanism—as God knows he would not be expected to—and less of its virtue.

Were he alive to-day the first man he would denounce would be his biographer and eulogist—Henry Cabot Lodge. In the sixtieth number of the Federalist Hamilton writes:

> We have seen that an incontrollable power over the elections for the Federal Government could not without hazard be committed to the State legislature. Let us now see what would be the danger on the other side—that is, from confiding the ultimate right of regulating its own elections to the Union itself. It is not pretended that this right would ever be used for the exclusion of any State from its share in the representation. * * *

Again—

> Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution empowering the United States to regulate the elections of the particular States; would any man hesitate to condemn it, both as an unwarranted transposition of power and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments? The violation of principle in this case would have required no comment.

The man who wrote that had too much mental integrity to hold in aught save detestation and abhorrence the political dogmas of the author of the force bill.

It is true that in his famous "Report on Manufacturers" Hamilton advanced about all the arguments in favor of a protective tariff that have been heard since, but the poor man never dreamed that the general principles announced by him would be perverted into a cloak for privileged plunder. Hamilton's schedules would have been tiny things compared with the duties of to-day, no more like the schedules of Dingley, no more resemblance than there is between the living skeleton and the fat woman in a side show. Says Hamilton:

> The continuance of bounties on manufactures long established must always be of questionable policy, because a presumption would arise in every such case that there were natural and inherent impediments to success.

Imagine the Secretary of the Treasury, in secret conclave with the heads of the steel trust, the leather trust, the paper trust, the pet and favored manufacturers of woolen and cotton goods. Fancy him, just before an election, about "fat-frying" and "touching" time, dropping an incongruvial remark like this, anent:

> Prohibitions of rival articles or duties equivalent to prohibitions. This—> is another efficacious means of encouraging national manufactures; but, in general, it is only fit to be employed when the manufacturer has made such progress and is in so many hands as to insure a due competition and an adequate supply on reasonable terms.

Hamilton has many sins to answer for, it is true, but he was bold and progressive; he never sat still, never "stood pat." It was a moral and mental impossibility for that lucid and splendid intellect to have been clouded or deluded by the fallacies of this later day so-called "protection," or for the author of the Federalist to have been a "stand-patter."

I was amazed at the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in his eulogy on Hamilton. Why, there is nothing to me in all this world as absolutely ridiculous and absurd as this effort of the Republican party to claim that it is the posthumous child of a putative father who died fifty years before it was born. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The Republican party at the close of the war, and until the close of the war, was not a party; it was a propaganda, and when the purposes of that propaganda were accomplished you were absolutely without issues or ancestors. You only had office and an appetite. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] And you proceeded to construct a platform and to hunt for respectable forefathers.

The "nouveau riche," after they obtain power and position, hunt for ancestors, and you went bogying about among the débris of dead Federalism and shattered Whiggery to find them, and you stumbled on the black side of Alexander Hamilton and accepted him as the patron saint of the Republican party. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Here my friend from Pennsylvania makes this statement:

> He certainly is a bold man who, in the face of history, contends to-day that the permanent policies which have entered into the statutes and character of our nation are not the policies dictated by Hamilton and his followers.

Here my temerity may argue more than my judgment, but I deny it. There never was a deduction more absolutely unfounded hurled defiantly into the teeth of history.

What were the policies of Alexander Hamilton?

He would have had a President for life—he is elected every four years.

He would have Senators during good behavior—they serve a fixed and definite term of six years.

He would have the Executive armed with an absolute veto—you can by two-thirds majority annul that veto.

He would have muzzled free speech—Jefferson opened the deliberations of this House to the naked view and candid criticism of a free and untrammeled press.

He defended the alien and sedition laws—they are repealed.

He founded a national bank—it is demolished.

All his cherished and vaunted schemes are "gone glimmering in the dream of things that were," exploded fallacies they litter the débris of history.

I challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give me one single solitary policy of Hamilton which was ever crystallized into law that lived. His policies are gone, his followers are dead. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] There are only left his apologists and his eulogists.

Says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, his interpretation of the Constitution made him immortal. "Yes," said Hamilton, "though it be not written in terms, if it be useful, proper, and necessary in the enjoyment of the powers expressly granted, it is impliedly written in the Constitution."

Hamilton was not the author of that theory. Roosevelt was the author of that theory, and I can prove it. Not Theodore Roosevelt but another Roosevelt. Said Thomas Jefferson, in a letter written in 1800 to Livingston:

> We are here engaged in improving our Constitution by construction, so as to make it what the majority thinks it should have been. The Senate received yesterday a bill from the Representatives incorporating a company for Roosevelt's copper mines in Jersey. This is under the sweeping clause of the Constitution, and supported by the following pedigree of necessities. Congress are authorized to defend the country; ships are necessary for that defense; copper is necessary for ships; mines are necessary to produce copper; companies are necessary to work mines; and "this is the house that Jack built."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

You do not need to trace this Roosevelt. The lineal descendant of that Roosevelt occupies a broader sphere and a loftier place, and still shows the same profound knowledge of the law and the same respect for the Constitution. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I am at a loss to understand this persistent and pernicious laudation not of those who established but those who construe the Constitution. Construction is but another name for interpretation. The best construction of an instrument is the most just and lucid statement of its meaning. It is a libel upon the immortal names affixed to this sacred ægis of our liberties to assert that it is so unintelligible that he who can decipher deserves greater glory than they who wrote it.

This vaunted capacity for a liberal interpretation of the Constitution was with Hamilton a means to an end. He felt for the form of government it embodied and should perpetuate a profound and ever increasing distrust and often expressed for it an undisguised contempt. He exhausted his morbid ingenuity in an unceasing effort to read into it those very policies which when presented in their naked hideousness the framers of the Constitution refused to accept or consider.

His measures in the concrete, his ideas of tenure of office, a central bank, a restricted and privileged electorate, of pomp and ceremonial, of a virtual censorship of the press, no man on either side of this Chamber would for a moment reestablish or indorse. Yet his untiring effort to stretch and distort and construe the organic law until on its dismembered form he might erect a throne that you would immortalize.

I exceedingly regret to see both in this Chamber and out of it a sort of literary conspiracy to further glorify Hamilton by a studied detraction of his great adversary and contemporary, Thomas Jefferson.

In discussing the Louisiana purchase, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says:

> Mr. Jefferson never dreamed of acquiring any of the territory west of the Mississippi save only the post of New Orleans. And he never dreamed even of that until the Western settlers, deprived of treaty rights of deposit at New Orleans, drove him to it. It was to acquire New Orleans only that he sent Monroe to France. Both he and his Secretary of State, Mr. Madison, saw nothing but danger in any acquisition of territory west of the Mississippi. To the French minister in Washington they explained that the United States had no interest in extending its population to the west bank, "since such extension would tend to weaken the State and to slacken the concentration of its forces." "In spite of affinities in manner and language," said his Secretary of State, "no colony beyond the river could exist under the same government, but would infallibly give birth to a separate State, having in its bosom germs of collision with the East, the easier to develop in proportion to the very affinity between the two empires."
> Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from what he is quoting now?
> Mr. DALZELL. I am quoting from the writings of Jefferson.
> But Robert Livingston, our minister to France, availed himself of his opportunity and of Napoleon's necessity and made the purchase of the great territory now constituting so many glorious States of the Union. The purchase took Jefferson by surprise. At first he thought he would cede a part of it to the Indians in exchange for their holdings on the east side of the Mississippi and "shut up all the rest from settlement for a long time to come." Then he raised the question of a constitutional amendment. "I suppose Congress must appeal to the nation for an additional article to the Constitution approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized," he wrote Senator Breckenridge, of Kentucky. "The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence"—mark the term, the "fugitive occurrence"—"which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution."
> When these views reached Livingston in France, he immediately gave Jefferson to understand that if the business were to be done over again, it never would be done. And thereupon Jefferson took alarm and immediately sent off another letter to Senator Breckenridge, in which he said:
> "I wrote you on the 12th instant on the subject of Louisiana and the constitutional provision which might be necessary for it. A letter just received yesterday shows that nothing must be said on that subject which may give a pretext for retreating, but that we should do sub silentio what shall be found necessary. Be so good, therefore, as to consider that part of my letter confidential."

A greater number of erroneous conclusions were never condensed into similar space. Take the statement—

> Mr. Jefferson never dreamed of acquiring any of the territory west of the Mississippi save only the post at New Orleans, and he never dreamed even of that until the western settlers deprived of treaty rights of deposit at New Orleans drove him to it.

Mr. Jefferson was not driven to negotiate for the post at New Orleans by the demand of Western settlers or by the denial of treaty rights of deposit at New Orleans, for the simple reason that he appointed Mr. Livingston minister to France and instructed him at length as to the nature of the remonstrance he should make against the holding of Louisiana by the French before any denial of treaty rights had occurred or was contemplated either by Jefferson or Livingston.

On March 29, 1801, Rufus King, then minister at London, wrote to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State:

> The cession of Tuscany to the infant Duke of Parma, by the treaty between France and Austria forms a more compact and valuable compensation to this branch of the House of Spain than was formerly thought of, and adds very great credit to the opinion which at this time prevails both in Paris and London, that Spain has in return actually ceded Louisiana and Florida to France.

On September 28, 1801, Mr. Madison wrote to Robert R. Livingston:

> From different sources information has been received that by some transaction concluded or contemplated between France and Spain the mouth of the Mississippi, with certain portions of adjacent territory, is to pass from the hands of the latter to the former nation. Such a change of our neighbors is of too momentous a concern not to have engaged the most serious attention of the Executive.

As early as 1797, one year before the three years' guaranty of the right of deposit at New Orleans, as fixed by the treaty of 1795, had expired, Jefferson wrote to James Monroe:

> The exchange, which is to give us new neighbors in Louisiana—probably the present French armies when disbanded—has opened us to combinations of enemies on that side where we are most vulnerable.

In all this correspondence there is not one line or syllable about rights of deposit at New Orleans, for the simple reason that no such rights had at that time been denied. On February 18, 1803, two years after Livingston had been sent as minister to France, and nearly two years after he had repeatedly remonstrated in the strongest terms against the holding of New Orleans or Louisiana by the French, and after the most persistent effort to secure not only the post at New Orleans, "but Florida and territory north of the Arkansas River," he writes Mr. Madison as follows:

> I have proposed to them the relinquishment of New Orleans and West Florida, as far as the river Perdido, together with all the territory lying north of the Arkansas.

Why he should make such a proposition, if the only purpose of Jefferson was to get the right of deposit at the port of New Orleans, is inexplicable.

In this same letter he writes:

> I have accordingly put in his hands [Bonaparte's] some notes containing plain truth, etc.

One of these notes read as follows:

> On the twentieth of October (1802)[a] the governor of New Orleans issued a proclamation, in which, speaking of the Americans, he says they will not in future be permitted to make a deposit of their cargo in New Orleans, in conformity to the twenty-second article of their treaty, which has expired.

On September 28, 1801, Mr. Livingston was advised by the Department of State to secure New Orleans and the Floridas. So far from being driven to it by a violation of treaty rights of deposit, he had never even heard of any such violation until January 10, 1803. On that date he writes to the French Minister of Exterior Relations:

> I have just learned through a channel which, though not official, is such that it leaves one no doubt of its authenticity, that the governor of New Orleans has denied citizens of New Orleans a right of deposit there, etc.

On November 27, 1802, Mr. Madison wrote to Charles Pinckney, minister to Spain:

> A letter from a confidential citizen at New Orleans has just informed us that the intendant at that place by a proclamation, from which an extract is also inclosed, had prohibited the deposit of American effects, stipulated by treaty of 1795.

On April 18, 1802, Thomas Jefferson wrote to Mr. Livingston:

> If France considers Louisiana, however, as indispensable to her views, she might, however, be willing to look about for arrangements which might reconcile it to our interests; if anything should do this it would be the ceding to us the island of New Orleans and the Floridas.

How Jefferson could have been driven to make this demand by the violation of a treaty, six months before the treaty was violated and eleven months before he had any intimation of its violation is, to say the least, a most extraordinary occurrence.

Nor can I concur in the statement that—

> Jefferson never dreamed of acquiring any of the territory west of the Mississippi save only the post at New Orleans.

In a letter to Mr. Livingston, of date April 18, 1802, Jefferson writes:

> She [France] may say she needs Louisiana for the supply of her West Indies. She does not need it in time of peace. And in war she could not depend on them because they would be too easily intercepted. I should suppose that all these considerations could in some proper form be brought into the view of the Government of France.

Why bring all these things to the view of the Government of France if he only desired the continuance of a treaty right of deposit at the post of New Orleans, or if Jefferson never dreamed of acquiring any of the territory west of the Mississippi? Jefferson and everybody else at that time believed France would never cede the whole of Louisiana. It is plain that it was the fear that he might not be able to secure this valuable domain, and not that he neither dreamed of acquiring, nor that he did not desire it, that actuated him. This is manifest from the sentence which I have just quoted:

If France considers Louisiana, however, as indispensable for her views, she might, however, be willing to look about for arrangements which might reconcile it to our interests, etc.

As to the assertion that Mr. Madison saw nothing but danger in the acquisition of territory west of the Mississippi, and the argument that he opposed the acquisition of such territory, Mr. Madison fortunately has spoken for himself.

On July 29, 1803, Mr. Madison wrote Messrs. Livingston and Monroe:

The crisis relied upon has derived peculiar force from the rapidity with which the complaints and questions between France and Great Britain ripened toward a rupture; and it is just ground for mutual and general felicitation that it has issued under your zealous exertions in the extensive acquisition beyond the Mississippi.

Here we have the strange and startling spectacle of the Secretary of State's finding—

"just ground for mutual and general felicitation" upon the acquisition of territory beyond the Mississippi, although at the same time "Mr. Madison saw nothing but danger in the acquisition of territory west of the Mississippi."

Says the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

The purchase took Jefferson by surprise.

It did. It took Monroe and Livingston by surprise. It took Spain by surprise. It took France by surprise. It took Napoleon's own family by surprise. If there is any one thing—yes, there is only one thing—which above all else characterized the Great Conqueror, with whom Livingston and Monroe were dealing, it was that he always, in peace and war, in negotiation and in battle, took the other fellow by surprise. It was the secret of his success. "He was wrapped in the solitude of his own originality." He took the directory by surprise when he scattered the mob in the streets of Paris with grape and cannister. He took Italy by surprise when he "mingled the eagles of France with the eagles of the crags," and conquered the Alps before his approach was suspected in the plains below. He took Russia by surprise at Austerlitz; Austria at Wagram and at Marengo. He kept all Europe in a continual state of surprise for twenty years. He violated every tradition, every rule of statecraft and tactics, but he conquered half the world and wrote the Code Napoleon.

And why should he not have taken Jefferson by surprise, by the sudden and unheralded announcement that he had thrown an empire on the market with a ninety-day option and fifty million francs the purchase price? It was Napoleonic; that was all. Jefferson's greatness rests, not upon the fact that he was not surprised, but he is the only man born of woman whom the daring Corsican ever surprised and then let his astonished antagonist get the best of the bargain. Jefferson, notwithstanding his surprise, rose grandly to the occasion, and by his daring and superb diplomacy found in "the fugitive occurrence" a future empire. In a letter to Doctor Priestley, Jefferson frankly admits his surprise. He says:

I did not expect that he would yield until a war took place between France and England, and my hope was to palliate and endure, etc. I believed the event not very distant, but acknowledge it came sooner than I expected.

Napoleon sold Louisiana as he would have sold a horse or a cannon; he consulted nobody. Jefferson and Livingston soon realized that they had the First Consul to deal with and the First Consul alone. On September 1, 1802, Livingston wrote Mr. Madison:

There never was a government in which less could be done by negotiation than here. There is no people, no legislature, no counselors. One man is everything. He seldom asks advice, and never receives it unasked. His ministers are mere clerks, and his legislature and counselors parade officers.

Livingston was as much surprised as Jefferson, when, like a flash of lightning out of a clear sky, Bonaparte abruptly asked: "What will your country pay for an empire greater in extent than the whole area of the United States?"

Says Mr. Hosmer in his History of the Louisiana Purchase:

On the 11th of April, Talleyrand startled the envoy (Livingston) by the inquiry whether the United States would buy the whole of Louisiana and what price it would be willing to pay.

Mr. Livingston's reply betrays his surprise:

I told him (Talleyrand) I should receive with pleasure any communication from him, but that we were not disposed to trifle; that the times were critical.

Is it any wonder this declaration of Talleyrand "took Jefferson by surprise?"

The acquisition of Louisiana was one of the most cherished plans of the First Consul.

To his brother, Lucien, who concluded the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to France, Napoleon said:

Above all don't let Louisiana go; hold fast to that.

Said Messrs. Livingston and Monroe in a letter to Mr. Madison:

Louisiana was acquired of Spain by France, in exchange for Tuscany, which latter is settled by treaty on the son-in-law of the King of Spain, with the title of King of Etruria, and was estimated in the exchange in consideration of its revenue at one hundred million francs. The First Consul thought he had made an advantageous bargain in that exchange, as appears by the high idea he entertained of its value, as shown on many occasions. Louisiana was the territory which he promised, in his proclamation at the peace, as an asylum to those who had become unfortunate by the Revolution, and which he spoke of as vast and fertile.

Again Livingston writes:

They are made to believe that this is one of the most fertile and important countries in the world, * * * It is a darling object with the First Consul, who sees in it a means to gratify his friends and to dispose of his enemies.

In addition to all this Napoleon repeatedly said he would never sell Louisiana.

On March 11, 1803, Livingston writes the Secretary of State:

I told you that Talleyrand assured me no sale would be heard of. You will find a passage in the note which was doubtless intended to convey that idea in very strong terms.

The next day he writes:

With respect to a negotiation for Louisiana, I think nothing will be effected here.

On April 11, Livingston again wrote Madison:

I had reason to believe that he (Bonaparte) began to waver; but we had nothing to offer but money and commercial advantages; of the latter, I did not think myself entitled to be liberal; and of the first, I found in them a certain degree of reluctance to treat, as derogatory to the dignity of the Government.

Again says Livingston:

Among the most fortunate projects of the First Consul was the colonization of Louisiana. He saw in it a new Egypt; he saw in it a colony that was to counterbalance the eastern establishment of Britain; he saw in it an asylum for his generals; and, what is more important in the then state of things, he saw in it a pretense for the ostracism of suspected enemies. To render the acquisition still more acceptable to the people, exaggerated accounts of its fertility, etc., were sold in every printshop. My first endeavor was to remove these impressions from the minds of the people most likely to be consulted, in which I was generally speaking very successful. But they all told me that it was a favorite project with the First Consul; nor would any of them hear of disposing of it by sale.

After reading this character of reports from his foreign minister for two years, Jefferson hears that Napoleon has suddenly thrown this vast empire on the world's bargain counter, proposes to sell the whole of Louisiana for one-half of its estimated cost, and we are to conclude that the great Executive was lacking in foresight and statesmanship, because "The purchase took Jefferson by surprise."

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] proceeds:

At first he thought he would cede a part of it to the Indians in exchange for their holdings on the east side of the Mississippi and shut up all the rest from settlement for a long time to come.

Then he raised the question of a constitutional amendment:

"I suppose Congress must appeal to the nation for an additional article to the Constitution approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized," he wrote Senator Breckenridge, of Kentucky.

What are we to infer from this language? If it means anything, it means that Jefferson was not only surprised, but disappointed, at this purchase, and that he raised objections both to the ceding and to the settlement of this country.

Let us take up this very letter written to Breckenridge of August 12, 1803, and see if any such idea was in the mind of the great Executive. He continues:

The legislature in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties, and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a position to do it. It is the case of guardian investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory, and saying to him when of age, "I did this for your good; you may disown me, and I must get out of the scrape as I can. I thought it my duty to risk myself for you." But we shall not be disavowed by the nation, and their act of indemnity will confirm and not weaken the Constitution by more strongly working out its lines.

Was Jefferson indeed so determined to barter this domain to Indians, and shut up all the rest from settlement for a long time to come?

Again I quote this same letter to Mr. Breckenridge, from which he [DALZELL] seems to reach so many conclusions:

Objections are raising to the eastward against the vast extent of our boundaries, and propositions are made to exchange Louisiana, or a part of it, for the Floridas. But, as I have said, we shall get the Floridas, and I would not give up one inch of the waters of the Mississippi to any nation, because I see in a light very important to our peace the exclusive right to its navigation, and the admission of no nation into it but, as into the Potomac and the Delaware, with our consent and under our police.

And now comes a part of this letter which throws a flood of light upon the whole question:

These Federalists see in this acquisition the formation of a new confederacy, embracing all the waters of the Mississippi, on both sides of it, and a separation of its eastern waters from us. These conditions depend on so many circumstances which we can not foresee that I place but little reliance on them. * * *

When I view the Atlantic States procuring for those on the eastern waters of the Mississippi friendly instead of hostile neighbors on the western waters, I do not view it as an Englishman would the procuring of future blessings for the French nation, with whom he has no relation of blood or affection. The future Atlantic and Mississippi States will be our sons. We have them in distinct but bordering establishments. We think we see their happiness in their union, and we wish it. * * *

God bless them both and keep them in union, if it be for their good, but separate them if it be better.

We fail to see anything in this letter which could in any way have disturbed the equanimity of Mr. Livingston. Yet we are told that—

When these views reached Livingston in France he immediately gave Jefferson to understand that if the business were to be done over again it never would be done. And thereupon Jefferson took alarm and immediately sent off another letter to Senator Breckenridge in which he said: "I wrote you on the 12th instant on the subject of Louisiana, and the constitutional provision which might be necessary for it. A letter just received yesterday shows that nothing must be said on that subject which may give a pretext for retreating, but that we should do sub silentio what shall be found necessary. Be so good, therefore, as to consider that part of my letter confidential." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

We note the laughter and applause on the Republican side as recorded in the RECORD, and a close examination of the exhibits in the case reveals a very amusing state of affairs.

Here is the letter in which Mr. Livingston uses the very identical words quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the only letter in which such language is used:

[Extract—Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison.]

PARIS, July 30, 1803.

SIR: The House of Baring, etc. * * * Be assured that were the business to be done again it would never be done. They think we have attained an immense advantage over them, etc.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Now there is not one line or syllable in this letter about "these views" reaching him. How could they? "These views" were published on August 12 and this letter was written July 30 preceding. Now, it is equally impossible that Jefferson at receiving this news "thereupon took alarm and immediately sent off another letter to Senator Breckenridge," for the simple reason that the second, this sub silentio, this letter which tickles the risibles of the Republican side of the House, was written on August 18, 1803. How could Jefferson in Washington take alarm at any letter written in Paris nineteen days before?

At this time the wizards of the nineteenth century had not yet performed miracles with electricity, steam, and steel. Locomotion by land was by the stage coach and on the sea by sail vessels. We know from this very correspondence just how long it took to cross the Atlantic Ocean. On April 11, 1803, Mr. Livingston wrote Mr. Madison, "Mr. Monroe arrived on the 1st at Havre. I expect him here in two days at furthest from this date." His passage was twenty-nine days. This was written on the 11th, so it took Mr. Monroe traveling post haste on this all-important mission forty-two days to cross the ocean and get from Havre to Paris. Yet at the same time Mr. Jefferson was alarmed by a letter which at the time he took this unaccountable "scare" was necessarily somewhere about the middle of the Atlantic Ocean. Was it "these views" reaching Livingston in France that made him write the letter of July 30, or the letter referred to in the letter of August 18, written to Breckenridge? Certainly not. There is no doubt about the letter Jefferson refers to—he identifies it himself, and it is of course not the letter mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

On the same day, August 18, Jefferson writes Mr. Madison:

I inclose you two letters from Robert R. Livingston; that of the 2d of June is just intelligible enough in the undeciphered parts to create anxieties which perhaps the cipher can remove. I infer that the less one says about the constitutional difficulties respecting Louisiana the better, and what is necessary for surmounting them must be done sub silentio.

Now let us see the "two letters," one of date June 2d, to which Jefferson refers, and we can instantly discover to what extent "these views reached Livingston in France."

On June 3d Livingston writes Madison:

My letter to the President and our joint letter will so fully explain this extraordinary business as to make any further observations unnecessary, etc.

What was this extraordinary business?

Here it is:

[Translation.]

M. Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury, to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe.

Paris 20th Floreal 11th year (9th April, 1803.)

GENTLEMEN: The article of the convention relative to the payment which the United States have to make to France, in three months at most, after the satisfaction of the treaties and after the taking possession of Louisiana in the name of the United States, determines, in a precise manner, the largest terms agreed upon for the consummation of this affair. They are three months after satisfaction and the taking of possession. It is proper to foresee, also, the case in which this business should not be consummated within the interval above expressed, and as they are precise, it is well understood that every extraordinary delay beyond the date fixed places the contracting parties in the same situation as if they had never treated. These consequences of the stipulations agreed upon are just and necessary, etc.

BARBE MARBOIS.

To which the following reply was sent:

Messrs. Livingston and Monroe to M. Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury.

PARIS, June 2, 1803.

SIR: We have received the letter with which you have honored us, dated 20th Floreal. Without entering into the principles it lays down, we are ready to admit, in order to remove, as far as depends on us, all difficulties, that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty and conventions, and that any neglect on their part to do so puts it in the power of the Government of France to declare how far it will or it will not be bound thereby, or entitle it to a compensation for the damage it may sustain.

We will observe, sir, that, in making these concessions, we mean to confine ourselves to the letter of the treaty.

With the largest respect, etc.,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.
JAMES MONROE.

Again Livingston writes Madison:

Be persuaded that France is sick of the bargain; that Spain is much dissatisfied, and that the slightest pretense will lose you the treaty. Nothing has raised the reputation of our country in Europe so high as the conduct of our Government on this occasion both at home and abroad.

So it was not—these views reaching Livingston in France, but the effort of France to evade a bad bargain into which she had been drawn by the exquisite diplomacy—the conduct of our Government on this occasion both at home and abroad.

In the face of this new complication, and as I shall show further on, on account of the blind implacable opposition of the Federalists to the "conduct of our Government both at home and abroad," which had "raised the reputation of our country in Europe so high."

This opposition and the necessity of ratifying the treaty, if at all, in ninety days, made it expedient to waive a constitutional question, and forced Jefferson and his friends to proceed sub silentio.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania then makes this remarkable statement:

The dominant statesmen of that day held, as was subsequently held by the courts, that the United States was a sovereign nation, having and entitled to exercise all the powers of any sovereign nation, the right to make war and peace, the right to acquire territory, and, as a necessary consequence of that right, the right to govern it without limitation save in the discretion of the Congress. That is the law of the land to-day as applied with respect to our new possessions, so that not only was Mr. Jefferson not the author of the Louisiana Purchase in the first instance, but the credit of having that great territory that we have to-day is due to the doctrines laid down by Alexander Hamilton in assertion of the nation's powers under the Constitution. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He is not explicit as to what he means by "the dominant statesmen of that day." If he means they who were responsible for the conduct of the Government, were dominant in the sense that they controlled, why, the Federalists having been routed "horse, foot, and dragoons," they were all Democrats. If he means those whose worth, capacity, patriotism, and disinterested devotion to the common weal rendered them worthy to rule, why the great majority of that class have always been Democrats. I presume he means those Federalists whose political prominence and official position made them dominant in their own party. And it is a fair inference from this statement that these "dominant statesmen" held that no amendment to the organic law was necessary—that the United States was a sovereign nation, having the right to acquire territory, and, as a necessary consequence of that right, the right to govern it without limitation, save in the discretion of the Congress.

Fortunately these "dominant" Federalists have left an eternal memorial of their words and acts on this occasion. James K. Hosmer, in his history of the Louisiana purchase, is certainly no extravagant admirer of Jefferson. Yet he says:

In dealing with the danger which the approach of France brought to the United States, Jefferson and his party had shown a wiser and humaner spirit than did the opposition. Now in this later stage of the affair when the transfer of Louisiana by France to America had come about, it is the Jeffersonian policy which we from this distance must commend; for the Federalists became turbulent and factious. To this day in old New England families the tradition persists of the rancor with which Jefferson was regarded. There could be no good, so thought the friends of John Adams, in anything his rival had done, and the country would never be safe until they were again out of power. Incorporation of foreign territory was unconstitutional in the extreme and impossible in the extreme. The East might become depopulated through an emigration that might be expected to set out into the purchase. Secession of the trans-Mississippi country might certainly be looked for; there could never be anything in common between the men of the plains and the men of the coast.

Again—

Having stated his points, the Federalist leader (Griswold) dwelt on the impolicy of the treaty. What troubles were certain to arise in dealing with so vast an area, for the most part a wilderness, and, when peopled, having inhabitants so foreign in tongue, manners, and religion. Promptly as possible, on October 19, Gaylord Griswold again stood up in opposition, arguing that the Louisiana treaty was unconstitutional, first, because the treaty-making power does not extend to incorporating foreign soil and foreign people into the United States.

The words "new States may be admitted into the Union" he declared meant new States carved out of the territory belonging to the United States at the time the Union was founded.

But granting for the moment that such incorporations were right it belonged certainly not to Congress, to the President, and Senate.

When the matter came up in the Senate * * * Timothy Pickering of Massachusetts made the extremest statements possible of the rights of the States. He declared that to his mind the treaty was unconstitutional because it stipulated something no power existing could carry out.

The third article read, "The inhabitants of the ceded territory should be incorporated into the Union of the United States." Who was competent to carry that out? Not the President and Senate; not the President and Congress; not an amendment to the Constitution passed by two-thirds vote of both Houses and three-quarters of the States. He believed that the assent of every State was necessary before a foreign country could join the Union. * * * No acquisition of foreign territory was contemplated or provided for, and ought therefore to be regarded as impossible.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has not stated the name of any "dominant statesman," not a Democrat, in either the House or the Senate, at this time who urged that this territory could be annexed by virtue of the implied powers of the Constitution. After diligent search I have failed to find him.

The "dominant statesmen," among the Federalists, then in the House and Senate, were suffering from a chronic attack of Anglomania, were rendered hysterical by the excesses of the French Revolution, and were destined soon to write the ignominious epitaph of their party at the Hartford convention.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] would have us believe that Jefferson, in his letter to Senator Breckenridge August 18, raised the question of an amendment to the Constitution and thereafter abandoned it. He asks: "Was there any constitutional amendment ever offered to indorse the Louisiana purchase? Certainly not, no such amendment was sought."

It will be remembered that in the treaty, by which Louisiana was ceded, there was the additional provision that the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, privileges and advantages, and the immunities of citizens of the United States.

Jefferson never regarded an amendment to the Constitution as necessary to the acquiring of new territory; he thought it wise and expedient in order that he might fix more definitely the exact status of the new States, which were to be carved out of the newly acquired territory.

Nearly a year before the much-discussed Breckenridge correspondence, on January 1, he wrote Gallatin:

You are right in my opinion about Mr. Livingston's position, there is no difficulty about the acquiring of new territory, and whether, when acquired, it may be taken into the Union by the Constitution, as it now stands, will be a question of expediency. I think it will be safer not to permit the enlargement of the Union, but by an amendment of the Constitution.

Nothing Jefferson ever wrote displayed more fully that marvelous seerlike power which he, and he alone, seemed to possess. He was the oracle in the new temple, erected in so great a measure by his genius. With the admission of the trans-Mississippi States into the Union he had two groups of Commonwealths externally alike, yet occupying a different status and possessing certain powers and privileges emanating from diametrically opposite sources. The original colonies, absolutely separate and independent sovereignties, by the most solemn covenant, with jealous care, divested themselves of certain powers, conferring them upon a central government, and at the same time providing that all powers not expressly delegated should be reserved to the States, respectively, and to the people thereof. But the new States never possessed any separate sovereignty, never delegated any powers, never possessed the power to reserve them in the full meaning in which that language was used by the colonies.

The thirteen colonies created the Federal Union and defined and limited its powers. This Government then purchased Louisiana and conferred the privileges and immunities of statehood upon the various Commonwealths into which it was subsequently divided.

Necessarily the question of the relation of the State to the Federal Government, its reserved rights, its sovereignty, must have an entirely different aspect as seen from the angle of Virgina and South Carolina, or from Kansas or Missouri. This very question was to raise a cloud upon the horizon of the nation's peace, even before the great author of that purchase went to his final reward.

In the thirty years of heated discussion which followed there is a certain sameness in the arguments and illustrations both on the part of those who maintained and those who denied the sovereignty of the State. It was the difference of opinion which was intuitive, almost necessary, between men attempting to fix the status of the States and regarding union from the genesis of Kansas or of South Carolina. In the light of subsequent events, it was not a lack of foresight or wisdom in Jefferson when he thought it expedient to "bring out more strongly the lines of the Constitution," and in the face of this new situation to establish in advance and unequivocally just what delegated and what inherent powers were vested in the States and the Union, respectively, upon their admission into the new Government.

From Webster, Clay, and Calhoun to Toombs, Douglas, and Lincoln, this vexed question was debated with constantly increasing acrimony, till at last a frenzied nation appealed from the forum of discussion to the field of arms—billions of treasure and 500,000 gallant lives were engulfed in the horrid vortex of that maelstrom.

Who will say that this frightful fratricidal slaughter might not have been averted had it been permitted to the wise and peace-loving Sage of Monticello to guide the councils of men whose minds were then tranquil and open to conviction "in bringing out more fully the lines of the Constitution" and settling this hidden, but inherent and deadly, difference between the original and the acquired States of the Union?

Says the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]:

It was to acquire New Orleans only that he (Jefferson) sent Monroe to France. * * * But Robert Livingston, our minister to France, availed himself of his opportunity and Napoleon's necessity and made the purchase, etc.

To attribute all the glory to Livingston might detract from the personal renown of Jefferson; it could not affect the credit due the Democratic party. Livingston, Jefferson's associate, his friend, and a part of a Democratic administration, shed the luster of his splendid service upon the great party of which, at that time, he was an honored servant.

I do not know of any sense in which Livingston was "our minister," that Monroe was not "our minister," or Jefferson "our Presidnet."

He certainly was neither an imperialist nor a Republican.

Imagine, if you can, Jefferson's immortal foreign minister sent to Paris by McKinley to negotiate the purchase of the Philippines, as he was sent by the Sage of Monticello to wrench Louisiana from the grasp of Napoleon, opening the negotiations in the language if his famous "Notes on Louisiana."

Colonies are never cherished for themselves—

but on account of the influence they may have on the general prosperity of the nation. And as one man at home contributes more to this than two at a distance, no wise nation colonizes but when it has a superfluous population, or when it has a superfluous capital that can not otherwise be rendered productive. * * *

It will readily be admitted that transmarine colonies add nothing to the strength of a nation. They are, on the contrary, weak points that are guarded at great expense of men and money, and more particularly when they are placed in warm and unhealthy climates.

Imagine the amazement of the advocates of the Dingley tariff; horror and indignation in the depleted ranks of the "standpatters" when Mr. Livingston again announces to his new associates, who delight, in contradistinction to Jefferson and Monroe, to speak of him as "our minister," hear this old sound Jeffersonian doctrine from that same deathless document—

In San Domingo 20 per cent is paid by articles introduced by foreigners; this is indeed collected from the foreigners, etc. * * * But the money is paid by the planters; for it is always added to the price, and even an interest or profit charged on the duty itself, and a compensation for all the vexations the merchant suffers. What, then, is the effect of this operation but to deduct at least one-quarter from the money which the planter has, with difficulty, drawn from France or elsewhere, and so far to impede the reestablishment of the capital that can alone render the island ultimately productive to France. * * * Nay, I will venture to say, that, unless the ports of San Domingo are thrown open to all the vessels bringing necessaries, unless the inhabitants are permitted to buy cheap and to sell dear, by encouraging a competition between buyers and sellers, unless every species of vexation is removed * * * ages will elapse before San Domingo will cease to drain the wealth and strength of France without offering an equivalent return.

Spain's cession of Louisiana at San Ildefonso brought into a diplomatic game the two most commanding figures on the globe. The sage whose passion was peace and the chieftain whose god was war. Both shrewd, alert, and resourceful. Bonaparte determined to erect a new empire in the Western Hemisphere, and Jefferson intent upon saving it from the shackles of the tyrant. Between the two, Jefferson's great lieutenant, Livingston, passed like a courier, tireless and vigilant.

It is assumed that Jefferson did not realize the greatness of the drama in which he played so important a part, because he never demanded the whole of this vast domain, contenting himself with the repeated request for New Orleans and the Floridas. There is nothing more certain than to have demanded THE WHOLE of Louisiana would have been to have lost it. None understood this better than Jefferson. His long diplomatic service in Paris stood him in good stead; he knew the lofty pride of the First Consul, and the sensitive vanity of the French. The offer of money for this cherished empire implied the financial weakness and necessities of a nation, then dominating Europe, the suggestion that it could not be held by the haughty conqueror, was a challenge.

And yet Jefferson knew the needs of the Government, and the perils to which the newly acquired territory was subjected. With consummate tact, he directed the course of his great foreign minister. While demanding a port at New Orleans, the reasons assigned for the cession of a city, established the folly and the danger of any sovereignty, in any part of the ceded territory. Jefferson bided his time, while the First Consul in India, in Egypt, and in St. Domingo saw his cherished dream of colonization vanish like a mist, and with each repeated disaster, Livingston, determined and importunate, returned to the fray. Napoleon sought in Louisiana a source of supplies for Santo Domingo.

She may say that she needs Louisiana for the supply of her West Indies—writes Jefferson to Livingston—

she does not need it in time of peace. And in war she can not depend on them because they would be so easily intercepted. I would suppose all these considerations might in some proper form be brought into the view of the Government of France.

Napoleon flattered himself that Le Clerc would soon subdue Santo Domingo, and thence proceed immediately to New Orleans. Jefferson knew the seriousness of that undertaking; he writes Livingston:

The idea here is that the troops sent to St. Domingo were to proceed to Louisiana after finishing their work in that island. If this were the arrangement it will give you time to return again and again to the charge, for the conquest of St. Domingo will not be a short work.

At last the long-expected war cloud looms black and ominous across the English Channel, and Napoleon himself is no match for Nelson on the sea. Jefferson realizes it, and drops this ominous suggestion to Livingston:

The day that France takes possession of New Orleans fixes the sentence that is to restrain her forever within her low-water mark. It seals the union of two nations who in conjunction can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation.

A comparison of the correspondence between Livingston and Jefferson, or the Secretary of State, shows how the subtle and unanswerable arguments of Jefferson, uttered with the most exquisite tact and adroitness, all found their way to the eye and the heart of the First Consul, till at last, little realizing it, Bonaparte became a convert to the doctrine of Jefferson, uttered in a thousand seductive and convincing forms, that the true interest of France—yes, her honor and safety—demanded the cession of Louisiana to the United States.

Livingston, in high glee, declares:

I this day got a sight of a letter from the minister to M. Laussat, containing directions for giving up the country, and assigning the reasons for the cession. I was much flattered to find their reasons wholly drawn from the memoirs I had presented.

Jefferson's covert threat to "marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation" bore good fruit.

In assigning his reasons for the cession of Louisiana, Bonaparte declared:

They (the English) shall not have the Mississippi which they covet. Louisiana is nothing in comparison with their aggrandizement in all parts of the globe. * * *

I wish to take away from them the idea that they will ever be able to win this colony. I contemplate turning it over to the United States. (Hosmer, etc., 135.)

Napoleon was not in the habit of ceding territory to prevent its being taken from him by force.

Jefferson's diplomacy had noiselessly stolen from Napoleon that which he might, in another humor, have defied the world in arms to take.

But they tell us it was the genius of Livingston. Strange plenipotentiary acting in a matter of this vast import, without the advice or consent of the great statesman whom he always regarded with reverence and affection. Nobody knew better than Livingston the part Jefferson had played in this transaction.

That same charge had been made in Livingston's day, and he answered it with magnanimity and truth. He writes Madison:

As the President's views have been happily more correct than mine, as he has affected, without this harsh measure (the seizure of New Orleans), his great object; it certainly is not advisable to publish that we differed in sentiment. * * * The next point in which the letter may do harm is in authorizing an opinion, which the enemies of the Administration are most zealous in promoting, viz, that no credit is due either the President or his ministers.

Partial historians may delude a generation, or serve the petty purpose of the partisan; but I rejoice that in the archives of two nations there still reposes the incontrovertible proof of the invaluable services of Democracy's greatest President, and future ages will neither cavil nor question the assertion that the diplomacy of Thomas Jefferson doubled the domain of a nation which his guidance and wisdom have consecrated to the highest measure of liberty and happiness ever known among the children of men.

And the most amusing part of it all is the sweet simplicity and guileless trust of the gentleman's colleagues upon that side of the Chamber and the hilarious applause with which they greeted this most unique historical narrative. During three successive Congresses, I have heard the Rhoderick Dhu of that side of the Chamber call his compatriots to arms. I have listened in admiration and despair, as he stirs them to a forgetfulness of their sins as no other can. I came into the House the other day just before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was ready to address it. I was amazed at the attendance on that side, all dressed in its best bib and tucker. I asked what was the matter, and they told me in awed voice that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was going to speak. I sat down to listen with as much pleasure as any Republican on that side, though possibly not with the same edification. I was entranced by his eloquence, pleased by his boldness, and delighted at the fact that in that classic oration he was more inimitable and less dangerous than ever. Hitherto it has been a challenge. The last speech of Mr. DALZELL was a eulogy upon the Republican party. Eulogies are only pronounced above the body of the dead. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] "Ah," said the gentleman from Pennsylvania, "I come here to sing no new song, to make no new speech." The grand exalted ruler of the Ancient Order of Stand-patters, the high priest of protection, never uttered a truer thing than that. He said, amid thunderous applause, that he was going to plant the factory beside the farm. Oh, how they applauded that! They always applaud when Mr. DALZELL says they are going to plant the factory beside the farm. I don't know why. Do you know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] got that idea from Thomas Jefferson, the source of all political wisdom. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] He did it inadvertently, I admit, but he did it—that sentence that throws you into hysterics—and three times has Mr. DALZELL used it since I have been in Congress, and three times has that side of the House thrown a fit. Said Thomas Jefferson, in a letter to Benjamin Austin in 1816, ninety-two years ago:

"We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

You have been borrowing Democratic principles from that time until this, and claiming the credit for them; but I never thought that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the height of his splendid oratory, would become the humble disciple of Thomas Jefferson. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

This pernicious effort to disparage Jefferson and to deify Hamilton has its origin in the same national vice—Imperialism. You have become a world power; subject nations are held under a galling yoke, unwilling subjects to a nation whose political creed proclaimed to the world that "all men were created free and equal, and had an equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

You declare that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and hold men in unwilling and enforced subjection.

The Constitution no longer follows the flag; and they who proclaim themselves the followers of Lincoln forget his declaration "That they who deny liberty to others shall not long retain it for themselves."

You have turned your backs upon the teachings of all your illustrious dead, save one.

There was a day when every American gloried in the immortal utterance of Henry Clay, that "It is the doctrine of thrones that man is too ignorant to govern himself. Their partisans assert his incapacity, in reference to all nations. If they can not command universal assent to the proposition, it is then demanded as to particular nations, and our pride and our presumption too often make converts of us. I contend that it is to arraign the dispositions of Providence himself to suppose that He has created beings incapable of governing themselves."

Now, you prate like princes about the incapacity of your dependencies to govern themselves, as if you or I had ever been constituted the guardians of a people's liberties. Away with your "manifest destiny!" I tell you only kings claim to govern by divine right.

You give a yellow Filipino a privilege like a pill, and then watch his political pulse and bowels to see how he assimilates it.

Our forefathers gave this nation life, and risked their own to resist taxation without representation, yet you levy imports at Manila. By the inexorable logic of your pernicious system of government you are driven to abandon your political birthright and to accept the doctrines of Alexander Hamilton, for without him there are none among "Those dead but sceptered sovereigns who still rule our spirits from their urns" to whom you can turn.

In order that he shall be an acceptable patron saint of Republicanism, you have retouched the picture until his best friend would never know him.

Book shelves groan with extravagant eulogies, under the pseudonym of biography, and your English cousins, delighted that this champion of caste and royalty has grown so great, rival you in this political canonization.

The simplest fact in his life is distorted out of all semblance of probability to fill out the faultless and fictitious figure.

This pleasure-loving, imperious, haughty Frenchman—high-spirited, knightly—possessing all the virtues and all the vices of a born courtier, whose blood still seethed with the fire of a tropical sun, is transformed into a colorless, spiritless, sinless, demure disciple of Cotton Mather. A pretty mess, this New England coterie, Lodge, Ellis, and company, have made of it! Hamilton was fitted in every way by temperament, opinion, and personal attractiveness to have graced the drawing-rooms of princes, but there was nothing, absolutely nothing, of the Puritan in him.

An Englishman by the name of Oliver has written what Hamilton's most ardent admirers are pleased to call an "adequate" history, in which he makes of him a demigod, and all the other Revolutionary heroes are demagogues or devils. He informs us—

> Hamilton was a type of the statesman, Jefferson the sophist.

And again, we read such delectable stuff as this:

> We may dismiss the theory of malign intriguers who perverted the judgment and poisoned the affections of the American people. The carefully organized misrepresentations of Samuel Adams, the smooth craftiness of Franklin, the heroics of Henry, and the phrases of Jefferson, etc.

We are solemnly informed that Aaron Burr, with demoniac malevolence, hunted to his death this devout Christian, who abhorred the practice of dueling, and who was driven by a false sense of duty and honor like a lamb to the slaughter.

Hamilton—

> came by his death as he had spent his life, in the service of his country. He did not die in a private quarrel. If he had fallen at Yorktown or been killed, as nearly came to pass, by the heavy labors of his office, he would not more certainly have sacrificed himself to the interests of the nation.

In Lodge's Life of Hamilton we read the ingenious story that Hamilton believed that those American Jacobins (Democrats) were going to send things to the ding bow wows, "confusion worse confounded," and that he alone possessed the military genius and capacity to save the country in a war which never occurred, and that he would not make the picturesque general he fancied he was if he refused a call to the "field of honor." And in order that he might live to save the country from impending ruin, he went out and stood at 10 paces, in front of a man of iron nerve, and a skilled marksman, and deliberately fired his pistol in the air. And Hamilton was a great logician, too.

Professor Edward S. Ellis, A. M., writes in a so-called history of Hamilton, and informs us:

> All the venom in Burr was roused by his crowning defeat. He knew that Hamilton was the cause, and he determined to kill him. It would not do to stab him from behind or to hire some one to administer poison. Either method would have been vulgar, and the consequences to himself might be disagreeable; but he selected a method which essentially was just as malignant in its nature.
> He resolved to force a quarrel upon Hamilton, etc., etc.

The manner of Hamilton's death in no way affects the value or character of his public service. I shall discuss the various accounts of this duel simply to illustrate the silly and transparent exaggerations of every act and every incident of Hamilton's life, in the effort to make him fit the niche prepared for him by his imperialistic votaries. I am in no sense an apologist for Aaron Burr; he was bad enough, but we should "give the devil his due."

Burr was neither a traitor nor a patriot. He was inordinately ambitious and absolutely selfish, and such selfishness in a public servant is only less odious than treason. He was a typical denizen of Wall street; he lived not to make his countrymen happy, but to make them profitable. They were his pawns and the earth his footstool. With his energy, his address, and his talents what a president of an insurance company he would have made, and what a howling success as the head of a trust. Burr was no model of conjugal fidelity, nor was Hamilton the ideal censor of such moral delinquencies.

Is it true that Burr causelessly hounded Hamilton to his death?

James Parton is not an especial admirer of Burr; he describes him as having "everything requisite for the attainment of permanent welfare except the ONE THING NEEDFUL—A CONSCIENCE."

In speaking of the hostile meeting between Burr and Hamilton, Parton writes:

> Gates, De Witt Clinton, Randolph, Benton, Clay, Jackson, Decatur, Arnold, Walpole, Pitt, Wellington, Canning, Peel, Grattan, Fox, Sheridan, Jefferson, Wilkes, D'Israeli, Lamartine, Thiers, and scores of less famous names are found in Mr. Sabin's list of duelists.
> In all that curious catalogue there is not the name of one politician who received provocation so often repeated, so irritating, and so injurious as that which Aaron Burr had received from Alexander Hamilton.
> Cheatham himself, in January of this very year, 1804, had taunted him for allowing Hamilton to speak and write of him as it was then notorious he was in the habit of doing. "Is the Vice-President sunk so low," said this wretched calumniator, "as to submit to be insulted by General Hamilton?"
> At every step of Burr's political career, without a single exception, Hamilton, by open efforts, by secret intrigue, or by both, had utterly opposed and forbidden his advancement. He had injured him in the estimation of General Washington. He had prevented Mr. Adams from giving him a military appointment. His letters for years had abounded in denunciation of him, as severe and unqualified as the language of a powerful declaimer could convey. From Burr's own table he had carried away the unguarded sallies of the host for use against the political opponent. The most offensive epithets and phrases he had so habitually applied to Burr that they had become familiar in the mouths of all the leading Federalists, who, as the reader may have observed, denounced Colonel Burr in Hamilton's own words.

Says Jenkinson in his history of Burr:

> There is, therefore, no semblance of truth in the charge that Burr forced Hamilton to accept his challenge by the unusual and unwarranted form of the demand made upon him. He had strictly followed the precedent set by Hamilton himself on a similar occasion; the fault was Hamilton's alone that he could not truthfully make the disavowal demanded. It was true that he had for years been traducing Burr's character in every form his ingenuity could invent, and many scores of his letters existed to attest the fact. It was, indeed, out of his power to make the disavowal required, and his only refuge was to deny the right to be questioned.

The injury which led to the fatal encounter, the published statement of Doctor Cooper that Hamilton had expressed "a still more despicable opinion of Burr," was the last offense of twenty years of uninterrupted traduction, "the straw that broke the camel's back."

I agree that we should not judge the duelist of that day by the standard of this. But there is no logic by which you can pardon the acceptor of a challenge and condemn the sender. By that barbarous code he who was charged with an infamous offense could not clear his skirts by proving its falsity. To prove the charge false and fail to resent it was to aggravate the imputation of cowardice, in that day more odious than vice or crime. The same perverted public opinion which necessitated the acceptance forced the sending of a challenge.

To tamely submit to insult publicly offered was to invite the same odium which attached to the refusal to accept a call to a duel when sent by the offended party. His contemporaries thoroughly understood this. In writing of this affair Hamilton's devoted friend and immortal eulogist, Gouverneur Morris, said:

In doing justice to the dead I would not injure the living—that Colonel Burr ought to be considered in the same light with any other man who had killed another in a duel. [Dickinson.]

No man understood this better than Hamilton. He had himself repeatedly resorted to this same method of resenting a real or fancied offense. Hearing that the President of the United States had made a slighting remark in no way as offensive as his habitual abuse of Burr, he immediately sent the following cartel to Mr. Adams:

It has been repeatedly mentioned to me that you have, on different occasions, asserted the existence of a British faction in this country, embracing a number of leading or influential characters of the Federal party (as usually denominated), and that you have sometimes named me, at others plainly alluding to me, as one of this description of persons. And I have likewise been assured that of late some of your warm adherents, for electioneering purposes, have employed a corresponding language.

I must, sir, take it for granted that you can not have made such assertions or insinuations without being willing to avow them; and to assign the reasons to a party who may conceive himself injured by them. I therefore trust that you will not deem it improper that I apply directly to yourself to ascertain from you in reference to your own declarations whether the information I have received has been correct or not; and, if correct, what are the grounds upon which you have founded the suggestions.

In that day this was the plainest kind of "fighting talk."

His opinions and practices are not recorded by political or personal enemies. Rufus King, the colleague in the Senate of his father-in-law—General Schuyler—and the life-long friend and admirer of Hamilton, in speaking of his opinions on this subject, says:

You can not, my dear sir, hold in greater abhorrence than I do the practice of dueling. Our lamented friend was not unacquainted with my opinion on the subject, but with a mind the most capacious and discriminating that I ever knew, he had laid down for the government of himself certain rules upon the subject of duels the fallacy of which would not fail to be seen by any man of ordinary understanding. With these guides, it is my deliberate opinion that he could not have avoided a meeting with Colonel Burr, had he even declined the first challenge.

He not only laid down for himself "certain rules upon the subject of duels," as his friend Rufus King says, but he lived up to them. Hamilton literally went through life "with a chip on his shoulder." He is the only prominent American of that or any other period who ever figured in a mortal combat before he was out of his teens. When a mere youth on Washington's staff he began this practice. Gen. Charles Lee criticised Washington and that general paid not the least attention to it. He does not appear to have been at all disturbed by it. Laurens and young Hamilton each insisted that he should have the pleasure of killing General Lee "a la mode." It was finally agreed that Laurens should act as principal and Hamilton as second. The challenge was accepted and Lee was shot and dangerously wounded.

Shortly after Hamilton retired from Washington's Cabinet he got into a heated argument with old Commodore Nicholson, who was an enthusiastic Jeffersonian Democrat and had very little patience for Hamilton's monarchical notions. The testy old commodore declared, "Why, sir, in asserting such political principles you are an abettor of Toriists." Off went Mr. Hamilton in high dudgeon and immediately challenged the old commodore to mortal combat. Of course Nicholson accepted. Such invitations were not often refused in those days. All the arrangements were made for a duel. Mutual friends discovering that these two men had blood in their eyes and were about to shoot each other over a trifle interposed and prevented the meeting. Again this paragon of peace, who so deeply abhorred the brutal custom of dueling, came to the conclusion in 1797 that James Monroe had made some remark which reflected upon Mr. Hamilton's integrity or gallantry, it is not very clear which; Mr. Monroe was immediately challenged. Monroe asked Burr to act as his second. Burr declined to do so, but by the irony of fate volunteered to act as a peacemaker. He managed to reconcile the parties and prevented the duel.

Even so profound a scholar as Justice Brewer, in a recent address in Washington, declared: "His (Hamilton's) death brought an end to dueling in the United States and had its effect throughout the world." His biographers all paint Hamilton at Weehawken as a sort of second St. Telemachus, immolating himself upon the bloody field of the duello and by his heroic and vicarious sacrifice abolishing that sanguinary and pernicious practice. We are told by a wiser philosopher than LODGE or Brewer that "He who lives by the sword shall fall by the sword." It was pitiful, inexpressibly sad, to see a man in the prime of life and vigor, accomplished, eloquent, with a loved and a loving family, cut off in the meridian of his career. It was sad; but it was not surprising. He fell upon a field where he had not been an unfamiliar figure and by a pitiless code which he had condoned or indorsed by the example and precept of a lifetime. He was no martyr in a good cause, but the victim of a bad one. Yet no detail is omitted and no story, however improbable, is untold which may tend to present this man as an innocent and deluded martyr to the perverted public sentiment of his day.

We are solemnly and seriously informed that "with malice toward none and charity for all," and after the man whom he had hounded for twenty years had mortally wounded him, he demurely fired his own pistol in the air, and yet the ball from that weapon cut a twig just above Burr's head, and Burr was not a tall man. Judge Van Ness, Burr's second, states positively that this is not true—that he fired first, and at Burr.

There is a little incident related by Todd, which throws a flood of light on this vexed question. After both men had taken their positions, and after they had raised their pistols ready to fire at the word "present," Burr facing the cliff and Hamilton looking over toward the city of New York, "One moment," said Hamilton, and then he removed his glasses, wiped them carefully with his handkerchief, and replaced them. The fatal word was then given. A man at a time like that does not carefully wipe his glasses to see how to shoot a pistol in the air.

It is true that on the night before this meeting Hamilton left a writing which does him no credit. In this he recants the teachings and practices of his life. When it is remembered that his own fireside had previously been desolated by this bloody and barbarous business, his own son, in the set phrase of the day, "had fallen in defense of his father's honor," and that even then no word of condemnation against "the code" escaped him, and that now when in a few hours he was about to face the man whom he had viciously traduced from his youth—for they had always been rivals, and had carried it to such an extent that even in the public prints Burr's enemies taunted him with the fact that he had tamely allowed General Hamilton to repeatedly insult him in the most public way—in the light of these facts that strange memorial sounds like a deathbed repentance. "It reads," said Burr, "like the confession of a penitent monk." The folly and wickedness of this cruel custom never dawned upon Hamilton till he could almost feel the ruthless lead of Aaron Burr crashing through his body.

Of course I do not mean to question the physical courage of Alexander Hamilton. Like a true son of France, whether on the field of battle or in private quarrel, he had hitherto always faced danger "with a gay and festive intrepidity."

It can not be denied, however, that Aaron Burr, with all his sins, uttered the simple truth when in that last ominous message to Hamilton he wrote:

Burr "having made great sacrifices for the sake of harmony; having exercised forbearance till it approached humiliation, he has seen no effect produced by such conduct but a repetition of the injury. * * * A. Burr, far from conceiving that rivalship authorizes a latitude not otherwise justifiable, feels greater delicacy in such cases and would think it meanness to speak of a rival but in terms of respect. * * * Such has invariably been his conduct toward Jay, Adams, and Hamilton, the only three who can be supposed to have stood in that relation to him."

Hamilton knew that he had driven his adversary to the wall, knew that he had pushed too far the almost stolid indifference of a patient man, at last rendered desperate and inexorable. It is more than probable, too, that he realized that in the heat of his anger he had done the man injustice, and it is not to his discredit that on this occasion, although believing in the code, he wished to avoid this last encounter. "Conscience makes cowards of us all."

The repeated assertion that the universal horror occasioned by the thinly disguised murder of Hamilton brought the code into instant disrepute is not only improbable in itself, it is in the teeth of history. Hamilton was among the very first and not the last of distinguished Americans to fall in a duel. The so-called "affairs of honor" between Barron and Decatur, Randolph and Clay, Jackson and Dickinson, Terry and Broderick, Cilley and Graves, all occurred after the scene at Weehawken. There was, long before 1804, a strong and growing sentiment against this useless and foolish custom fraught with so much agony to the innocent and helpless, bereaved by this monstrous relic of barbarism. It was not to the tragic fate of Hamilton, but the consistent lives and teachings of the illustrious men of that and succeeding periods, which at last set the seal of infamy upon this cold-blooded custom of scheduled murder. As early as 1779 Thomas Jefferson introduced a bill in the Virginia legislature providing that "Whosoever committed murder by way of a duel shall suffer death by hanging, and if he were the challenger, he shall be gibbetted." The moral courage necessary to introduce such a drastic measure, twenty years before this occurrence, did infinitely more to stop the infamous business than could possibly have resulted from the death of any man who went through life challenging everybody whose language was offensive, from the President down, and at last fell by the bloody sword with which he so often had threatened the life of his foes.

Ah, gentlemen, I know you still must have a military hero. This imperialism, this tendency toward a central government, this effort to force and to drive into one compact mass all the States and to make an autocrat of what was once a President, has forced you to open the ponderous and marble jaws of the grave, to drag from the cerements of the tomb the only monarchist that ever preached in America.

Ah, you say that I do him wrong. You say that I slander him. No, Mr. Chairman! The thing which you glorify in him that was the one thing for which his contemporaries and his friends damned him. When he lay dead there in New York, when the shadow of the tragedy of Weehawken hung over him, Gouverneur Morris sought his dying friend; he ministered to him in his agony, and, bathed in tears, uttered the last eulogy above his pallid corse.

Yet that night in his diary, intended for no eyes save his own, he indicted this strange picture of Hamilton:

> He was indiscreet, vain, opinionated. These things must be told or the character will be incomplete; yet it must be told in such a manner as not to destroy the interest. He was in principle opposed to a republican and attached to a monarchial government, and these, his opinions, were generally known, and have long and loudly been proclaimed. His share in framing our Constitution may be mentioned, and his unfortunate opinion can not therefore be concealed.

And Gouverneur Morris—surrounded by the assembled thousands who heard that immortal eulogy—paused, amidst his choking sobs, amidst his tears; he paused to ask those around him, in the name of the sanctity and pathos of death, to forgive Hamilton the thing for which the gentleman from Pennsylvania to-day would deify him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You need an emperor because you are imperialists, but there is no semblance of a parallel between the nationalism of Hamilton and the imperialism of Roosevelt. Those two characters have only this in common—a profound contempt for the Constitution and everlasting impatience of its restraints. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Hamilton from his early boyhood, yonder on a tiny isle in the Caribbean, dreamed of power; Roosevelt hungers for authority.

Hamilton, with a superb disdain for contemporary criticism and an unalterable faith in the judgment of after ages, builded his immortal fame. Roosevelt is deterred by clamor and intoxicated by applause. Both are essentially military men. Hamilton's passion for war and his great capacity for order and command argues the correctness of his cherished belief that he possessed rare military genius, and had the youth who fortified Mount Washington and led the charge at Yorktown had twenty more years on his head he would have ranked the first generals of the Revolution. But he wore his ominous sword with the dignity of a great commander. He did not wave it above his head like a drum major. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] This man performed more than he promised; meant more than he said. Your new imperialist is strenuous in speech and fickle in performance. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Hamilton never wielded "a big stick." Gentlemen, there is too much of the baton about that "big stick." At best it is a shillalah. It is large, but it is light. It is an excellent thing with which to crack the heads of recalcitrant Congressmen, but I seriously doubt its efficiency in actual war. [Applause on Democratic side.] And if it be true that the Executive anathema has lately been hurled at an obscure vender of drugs here in Washington, and while the judge is hearing the case or the jury is out the White House condemns him to a jail sentence, then it must in shame be admitted that the "big stick" is being used to-day to kill rats. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] talks about our following Mr. Bryan and sneers at him as the "peerless." Mr. Bryan has no authority, no office, no patronage. He commands because the majority of the free men in the Democratic party respect him as a statesman and trust him as a man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Bryan takes his followers by the hand; Roosevelt takes his partisans by the throat. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The majority on that side of the House, if I mistake not, does not agree with him "in my policies," yet you dare not murmur nor resist. Twice only in all his strenuous career have you raised your trembling heads. Once you refused to allow him to simplify spelling and you put the inscription back on the dollar. I knew you would do that. You revolted once, by a big majority of 225, got up on your hind legs, as it were, in holy horror and put "in God we trust" back on these vanishing dollars. That was a last expiring effort to restore confidence. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, Mr. Chairman [laughter], when I think of that atrocious crime, that effort of the President to take "in God we trust" off the dollars that we used to have! Why Harriman said he destroyed our faith in railroads; Morgan said he destroyed our faith in high finance, and now Roosevelt comes along and destroys the last evidence Republicans ever see that there is a God. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, Mr. Chairman, when I think of that cruel blow to confidence—gentlemen, where is confidence? For years and years I was told that you had her under lock and key; that she rode sidewise or otherwise around the White House on a big elephant; that she was under the dominion of the G. O. P. Is she dead, has she gone on a long journey, or is she asleep? Where is that fickle goddess, confidence? Oh, Mr. Chairman, how much better could the President have occupied his time? Oh, Mr. Chairman, did it never enter the head of the President—and what in the name of God is it that never entered the head of the President—did it never enter the head of the President that he could have brought order to his shattered columns, hope to his broken-hearted followers, if, instead of striking out the only evidence we have that there is any confidence left in God or man, he had only directed those in authority to inscribe upon the back of those cerulean blue clearing-house certificates some such legend as this, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." [Laughter.]

Dominate a cowering party as he may, we are assured by the reflection that the organic law, which withstood the able and insidious assaults of Alexander Hamilton, will not be materially affected by the fantastic performance of his strenuous disciple.

The eternal principles of Jefferson and his followers are interwoven with the very woof and warp of the Constitution, protecting the rights of the citizen and perpetuating his liberties.

That sacred instrument is more than a creation—it is a growth, the crystallization of the experience, the privation, and the heroism of hardy pioneers, wise in their day, and sleeplessly vigilant in safeguarding that freedom, bought at such an infinite cost of persecution and peril.

For centuries neither the telescope of the astronomer nor the researches of science could solve the mystery of that misty light, that glimmering gossamer encircling the black brow of night; at last the spectrum revealed in this nebula unborn worlds, held in a shimmering gauze; revolving masses of incandescent gas, cooling through the passing cycles of time, growing denser without, shrinking within, forming smoky concentric circles, a whirling luminous fog, congealing into molten rings drawn by their own gravity into rude globes, and these spinning spheres shaped by the plastic hand of Divinity, like clay upon a potter's wheel, into planets and their satellites, new solar systems, swinging for the first time into their orbits in the trackless, fathomless depths above. Thus God peoples the heavens' luminous worlds.

I have fancied that those daring bands of exiles, forgotten by one world and lost in the dark wilds of another, living and dying in ignorance of the mighty destiny of their children's children, conscious only that they were free—I have fancied that He, "with whom a thousand years are as a day or a watch in the night when it is passed," saw the unborn and puissant nation through all the mists of misery, persecution, and death, through which succeeding generations passed, first to independence, then to the mastery of the land and sea.

In the vast womb of the wilderness the colonies took form and voice, varying in their orbits and splendor, but they differed only "as one star differs from another star in glory." In the hour of destiny each found its own place about the great central power, to which, like the planets, they were eternally bound, yet forever separate. The fathers, I declare to you, heard the voice of God when they covered this continent with States, even as the heavens are bespangled with the stars.

The same peril awaits the star and the State. The State dissevered from her sisters is lost, even as a planet wrenched from its moorings, comet-like, becomes the wandering vagrant of the skies.

Either, drawn by the compelling gravity of a central force into its mighty vortex, is annihilated by the power which should have been the source of light and life.

From the chaos of disunion and the wreck of centralization may He who ordained long preserve this constellation of States.

Let no new Hamilton arise to disturb or destroy their exquisite balance—harmonious, distinct, indissoluble, they shall remain eternal as the revolving stars. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present for consideration of the committee the facts in a matter of great importance—the Oregon and California Railroad land grant.

The area of land devoted to agriculture and the quantity of products derived therefrom must steadily increase to meet the needs of our rapidly multiplying population. The Department of Agriculture is rendering a service of incalculable value. By its assistance old lands are put to more productive uses and lands heretofore considered unavailable are becoming an unexpected source of supply. Present fruits and crops are being improved. Introductions from abroad enrich the long-settled sections, and drought resistants and improved methods are conquering the lands heretofore designated as desert. The millions appropriated to agriculture are an investment paying dividends every day and yielding the peaceable fruits of prosperity every season. The farmers more than any other single body of our people have planted the principles of our Republic throughout the land; around their every fireside are cherished the rights and liberties, secured and retained at an inestimable cost; while every lowing herd, fruitful field, and profitable orchard are the visible signs of such enfranchisement. It is the duty of the legislator, as far as he has right to act, to enable all available areas to render their contributions to the public welfare and the public support.

Therefore at this time I desire to present for the consideration of the House some facts relative to the present condition and future welfare of an agricultural district prepared by nature for the dwelling place of a prosperous and numerous people. This is the First Congressional District of Oregon, which I have the honor to represent. In it the fruits, grains, and plants that grow in temperate climes are profitably and abundantly produced. It is plentifully watered and has resources of water power that, either directly or in the form of electric current, will continually operate large and varied industries. It is also rich in the resources of the forest and the mine. Its opportunities are attracting to it capital in search of investment, labor seeking wages, and settlers seeking homes. This district is remarkable because of the great proportion of people who own their homes. The continual increase in the population has emphasized the existence of a situation inimical to its development and settlement, and it is of this that I specially desire to speak. Senate joint resolution No. 48 of this Congress, now pending before this House, upon the favorable report of the Committee on the Public Lands, is the first step in the solution of a problem.

It has for its purpose the making available for development and settlement an area exceeding the combined areas of the States of Rhode Island and Delaware; it purposes to break the grip by which a great land monopoly holds such an area in idleness, without right, and restrains the people of the United States from the enjoyment of some 2,300,000 acres—2,000,000 acres patented and 300,000 acres claimed and awaiting patent—that Congress determined by law should be devoted to their use and maintenance. Briefly, the history is that by the act of July 25, 1866, Congress offered a grant of 12,800 acres of land for every mile of railroad which some company, to be designated by the legislature of the State of Oregon, should build from Portland to the California line. Such lands were to be the odd-numbered sections for 20 miles on each side of the line of the road, and in case any such lands were already occupied, then the company should have the right to select indemnity lands from lands lying within an additional 10 miles on either side. The line of the road would naturally run, and does run, through the heart of the Willamette, Umpqua, and Rogue River valleys, as fertile lands as any in the country. There was a company ready to apply for the grant, incorporated under the name of the Oregon Central Railroad Company, and was properly designated by the State legislature. It decided to build a road on the west side of the Willamette River from Portland southward.

Shortly thereafter a rival company was organized for the purpose of building a road on the east side of the river and making claim to the grant by the same name. These two companies were locally known as the "West Side Company" and the "East Side Company." The West Side Company accepted the grant within the time prescribed by the act of July 25, 1866, but it failed to build the road and finally abandoned all claim to the grant and received another grant by the act of May 4, 1870. The East Side Company induced the Oregon legislature to rescind its former designation and to designate the East Side Company on October 20, 1868. But as the time to accept the grant had now expired, the East Side Company applied to Congress to extend it, representing that the grant had lapsed. Congress so understood it and acted upon the theory that it was called upon to practically make a new grant and had the right to impose terms. Having changed its policy regarding the disposal of the public domain, it enacted, by the act of April 10, 1869, that the railroad company should sell the lands granted to actual settlers in quantities not exceeding 160 acres to any one person and at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre. That is, the company was given a bonus for construction purposes, to be derived from a sale of the lands and not exceeding $32,000 per mile of road, by the proviso in the act that at the same time would locate settlers along the line. It was a wise and just policy.

It was to enable a useful thoroughfare to be constructed, yet at the same time prevent a land monopoly and encourage settlement. So the grant never became vested except by virtue of and subject to the provisions of this act of April 10, 1869. The present holder of the grant, the Oregon and California Railroad Company, was organized on March 17, 1870, and shortly thereafter became the successor to whatever interests the East Side Company had.

For many years the lands were sold in more or less substantial compliance with the law, and although disputes arose occasionally, no serious conflict of public welfare with private intention occurred until in the early part of the decade, 1890–1900, when the railroad company began selling the land in great quantities in flagrant violation of the terms of its grant, and when about the year 1902 it ceased selling altogether. With increasing immigration and industries these lands were in demand, but when applications for purchase were made they were almost entirely denied.

The amount sold since 1902, so far as I can ascertain, is a very small quantity. The people began to inquire what measures of relief were possible. Various organizations of a public character discussed the problem. It became a general issue. The refusal to sell is a serious impediment to our prosperity and growth. The legislature in 1907 prepared a solemn memorial appealing to the General Government for relief. That memorial was presented to the last Congress. Since the lands are almost wholly located in my district, it became my duty as the Representative to urge the Government to enforce the terms of the proviso and to protect the rights of the people.

On March 7, 1907, I addressed a letter to the Department of the Interior, which was answered by Hon. R. A. Ballinger, then Commissioner of the General Land Office; while in his opinion the matter was one for the courts to decide, he said in his letter under date of March 19, 1907:

> The power of Congress to prescribe the proviso can not be questioned, in my judgment, in view of the fact that it was made in consideration of the extension of time granted the company, and the company is therefore without authority to sell these lands to any other person, in any other amount, or for a greater price than that prescribed in the proviso, and any conveyance which the company has attempted to make on a sale made in violation of the statute would not be sustained by the courts.

The matter was then laid before the Department of Justice, which, during the summer of 1907, sent Mr. B. D. Townsend, an attorney of North Dakota, to Oregon. He has thoroughly investigated the law and the transactions of the railroad thereunder. A summary of his findings is ably given in Senate Document No. 279, presented to this Congress. The history of the case has been previously briefly stated. The act of April 10, 1869, provided that the land should be sold in tracts not exceeding 160 acres, at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre, and to actual settlers. The restriction as to area and settlement followed the practice of the homestead laws. The following is a statement of the practice of the railroad company, the grantees:

> There have been deeded in compliance with the law 127,418.57 acres.
> There have been deeded in tracts of 160 acres or less to settlers, but at a price exceeding $2.50 per acre, 120,205.05 acres. There have been contracted under the same conditions 50,356.58 acres, making a total of 170,561.63 acres.
> In any proceedings contemplated it is not anticipated that these sales, amounting to 297,980.20 acres, will in any way be brought into question.

There have been sold in quantities exceeding 160 acres, but less than 640 acres, 91,900.04 acres; in quantities exceeding 640 acres, but less than 2,000 acres, 57,802.02 acres; in quantities exceeding 2,000 acres, 366,266.20 acres, making a total of 515,928.26 acres. These large sales, being substantial violations of the law, were made as follows, according to dates given in the deeds:

> From 1872 to 1898, if we exclude sales of less than 640 acres, 13,933.24 acres were sold.
> From 1898 until the company ceased selling, including sales only in excess of 640 acres, 410,095.34 acres were sold. Many of the sales were made on contracts extending over a term of years and did not become known until deeds were issued. Thus the serious and important violations complained of by the Government and the people are of recent date.

Congress took every precaution to prevent the establishment of a great land monopoly. The Government now, finding that precaution openly and persistently nullified, has undertaken measures of relief. Moreover, the president of the controlling company announced in a public speech in September, 1907, at Oakland, Cal., in answer to questions by the governor of Oregon, that the policy of refusing to sell any more land in obedience to the law, or otherwise, which has been in force since 1902, with immaterial exceptions, was to be continued as a permanent policy. Congress is, therefore, presented with this question: Shall it permit a company which has persistently and flagrantly violated the law to now unlawfully withdraw and withhold from sale some 2,300,000 acres of land, for which there are numerous demands under the law, as a reward for continuous violations, or shall Congress authorize the Department of Justice to submit to the courts of the United States all the questions involved and ask all appropriate remedies, that injustice may not be done?

Mr. Chairman, at this time I ask unanimous consent to insert the following tables, and other matters pertinent to this subject, in my remarks without reading and to extend them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAWLEY. I submit below the following tables from Senate Document No. 279, pages 9, 10, and 11, of this Congress for the information of the House, but which I will not read at this time:

> Tabulated statements: As a part of the work heretofore prosecuted by the Department of Justice, a complete statement has been obtained from the public records, the records of the railroad company, and other sources, showing all sales made by the railroad company. The work in Oregon was completed November 1, 1907. Records made since that time are therefore not included in the statements tabulated. These statements include all conveyances executed by the railroad company, together with all contracts now pending. As to the former, the exact purchase price was ascertained in each instance; as to the latter, this was impossible; but sufficient information was obtained to justify the estimate of $7 per acre as the average purchase price of the pending contracts, and this estimate is used so far as contracts are concerned in making up the following statements.
> In these compilations no attempt has been made to distinguish sales to actual settlers from sales to speculators. It may be safely stated, however, that none of the large sales are to actual settlers, and that even a large proportion of the smaller sales were made to speculators.

Total sales.

Average purchase price per acre, approximately, $5.42.

The following statement has been prepared to demonstrate the extent to which the conditions of the grant have been violated in the disposition of the lands. The sales are classified according to the number of acres conveyed and the purchase price. Conveyances for 160 acres or less are classified to indicate those wherein the purchase price exceeded $2.50 per acre. As to conveyances for more than 160 acres, this distinction is not observed, because the excessive quantity of land conveyed rendered such conveyances violations of the conditions of the grant. It may be stated, however, that with two or three unimportant exceptions all of the conveyances of large quantities are also at a price in excess of $2.50 per acre. Both grants are included in the following statements. Conveyances are treated separately from pending contracts.

Deeds conveying—	Number.	Acres.	Purchase price.
160 acres or less, at $2.50 per acre or less	1,947	127,418.57	$282,091.33
160 acres or less, at a price exceeding $2.50 per acre	2,148	120,205.05	493,098.30
Exceeding 160 acres, but less than 640 acres	233	75,023.41	250,885.52
Exceeding 640 acres, but less than 2,000 acres	46	51,102.02	335,555.91
2,000 acres or more	31	236,466.35	1,626,773.92
Total deeds	4,405	610,215.40	2,988,404.98

The following statement contains the same information concerning pending contracts, except that no distinction is made as to purchase price for the reason that all of the pending contracts are for a price in excess of $2.50 per acre.

Contracts to convey—	Number.	Acres.	Purchase price.
160 acres or less	857	50,356.58	$352,496.06
Exceeding 160 acres, but less than 640 acres	46	16,876.63	118,136.41
Exceeding 640 acres, but less than 2,000 acres	7	6,700.36	46,902.52
Exceeding 2,000 acres	8	129,759.85	908,318.95
Total contracts	918	203,693.42	1,425,853.94

Combining conveyances with pending contracts, we have the following:

	Number.	Acres.	Purchase price.
Sales within limitations both as to quantity and purchase price	1,947	127,418.57	$282,091.33
Sales within limitations as to quantity, but at a price exceeding $2.50 per acre	3,005	170,561.63	845,594.36
Sales in quantities exceeding 160 acres	371	515,928.62	3,286,573.23
Total sales	5,323	813,908.82	4,414,258.92

To illustrate the point that the large substantial violations have occurred recently the following statement has been prepared. The sales are compiled by two periods, the first one from 1872 to 1897, inclusive, and the second one from 1898 to 1907, inclusive:

	1872 to 1897.		1898 to 1907.
	Acres.	Purchase price.	Acres.	Purchase price.
160 acres or less, at $2.50 per acre or less	100,458.16	$215,879.47	26,960.41	$66,211.86
160 acres or less, at a price exceeding $2.50 per acre	55,240.39	206,140.32	115,321.24	639,454.04
Exceeding 160 acres, but less than 640 acres	34,223.59	80,388.75	57,676.45	288,633.18
Exceeding 640 acres, but less than 2,000 acres	11,698.54	42,117.21	46,103.84	340,341.22
Exceeding 2,000 acres	2,234.70	4,579.40	363,991.50	2,530,513.47
Total	203,855.38	549,105.15	610,053.44	3,865,153.77

The following table contains comparative totals of sales in quantities exceeding 160 acres, compiled for the same periods:

Period.	Acres.	Purchase price.
1872 to 1897	48,156.83	$127,085.36
1898 to 1907	467,771.79	3,159,487.87

Again, taking the sales in quantities exceeding 2,000 acres, the contrast is even more marked, as appears in the following table:

Period.	Sales.	Acres.	Purchase price.
1872 to 1897	1	2,234.70	$4,579.40
1898 to 1907	39	363,991.50	2,530,513.47

The one instance during the period 1872 to 1897 occurred in the year 1893.

Thus it appears that of 813,908.82 acres sold by the railroad company, only 127,418.57 acres were sold within the limitations of quantity and purchase price prescribed by the grant; and 515,928.62 acres were sold in quantities exceeding 160 acres, of which 363,991.50 acres were conveyed or sold to thirty-eight purchasers in quantities exceeding 2,000 acres to each purchaser, since the year 1897.

The foregoing tabulations appear inconsistent with the former statement that the large sales to timber men and speculators commenced about 1890. A word of explanation is necessary. With but one exception, all of the large sales were made by contract, providing for the payment of the purchase price in from seven to ten annual installments. Therefore, the large sales contracted in 1890 and succeeding years did not appear of record until the deeds were executed, commencing in December, 1897. The foregoing tabulations are based upon the date of the deeds, except as to pending contracts. The one exception referred to was the one instance of the large sale in 1893, which was a sale for cash instead of by contract. It should be added that many of the deeds were not recorded until long after they were executed, and several of the larger deeds have never been recorded.

In the foregoing tabulations no account has been taken of instances where more than one deed was given to a single purchaser. By combining the deeds executed by the railroad company to each purchaser, the extent of the violations will appear considerably greater than shown by the statement. Several purchasers received from ten to thirty deeds each, and in some of these instances each of the deeds was for 160 acres or less, and therefore appear in the compilations as nonviolations.

NATURE OF THE GRANT.

The act of 1869 was passed at the earnest solicitation of the company which received the grant, and they fully understood its terms, and filed a formal consent and acceptance of them. They know and always have known what was given them, as is shown by the substantial compliance with the terms of the grant for many years, and by the character of the deeds given by them. The terms of the proviso became operative only when the lands were transferred to the railroad to be sold by it. The Government, in order to assist the railroad in the sale of its lands, raised the price of the public lands within the limits of the grant to $2.50 per acre.

House Report No. 1301, from the Committee on the Public Lands of this Congress, says:

The grant extends entirely across the western part of Oregon, the richest part of the State, and embraces every odd section within 20 miles of the railroad, with 10 miles indemnity limits to compensate for losses within the place limits. Under the grants 2,800,000 acres of land have already been patented to the railroad company and approximately 300,000 acres more are claimed. By reason of delays in constructing the railroad, and from other causes not attributable to the Government, only approximately 300,000 acres were patented prior to the year 1893. Commencing with the last-named year, patents were rapidly issued until the year 1906, until the total amount patented was slightly in excess of 2,800,000 acres. So that the entire transaction is really more recent than the date of the original act would indicate. As a matter of fact, nearly all of the land has been received by the company in comparatively recent years.

NATURE OF THE DEEDS GIVEN.

On this subject I quote from Senate Document No. 279, page 8, as follows:

Nor was the railroad company unconscious of its offending. It realized the responsibilities it was incurring and adopted significant measures of defense. Prior to 1890 the railroad company had always given conveyances in the so-called "grant, bargain, and sale" form of deed, with implied covenants. There was no reason why it should change so long as it restricted itself to at least a substantial observance of the law. In 1891, however, it changed all of its forms of deeds and contracts and has ever since refused to execute anything but a quitclaim form of deed, except where it had by prior contract obligated itself to do otherwise. This is a most unusual circumstance. The title of the railroad company consisted simply of a grant from the United States. What liability did it seek to avoid by this unusual precaution?

Thus we find at about the year 1890 an unexpected and substantial demand for land, which gave the railroad company an opportunity to make wholesale violations of the terms of the grants with great profit. It immediately determined to take advantage of that opportunity, wholly ignoring the conditions of the grants, and sought protection against responsibility for these violations of the law by the adoption of the quitclaim form of conveyance. This policy was pursued by the company without restriction until 1902, during which period approximately 400,000 acres of land were sold to timbermen and speculators in quantities exceeding 1,000 acres to each purchaser.

I beg permission to insert here an editorial from the issue of February 26, 1908, of the Morning Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., a great newspaper. It has rendered invaluable assistance in this matter:

[Editorial of the Morning Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., February 26, 1908.]

RAILROAD LAND FRAUD.

Fraud has always marked the railroad land grants in Oregon. The land was obtained by fraud and the parts sold have been disposed of by fraudulent violation of the terms of the grants. More than 2,000,000 acres are held by the Southern Pacific in disobedience of those terms.

The Oregon and California Railroad repudiated the conditions attached to the grants for protection of the public interest from the very first. The land was given to the railroad in trust, to aid construction of its lines, and to be disposed of as the Government would have sold it to settlers. But the railroad assumed absolute ownership and has refused to sell the lands as the terms require—namely, at a price not exceeding $2.50 an acre, in quantities of not more than 160 acres to each purchaser, and to actual settlers only.

Details of this unlawful grab have been exposed for the first time, completely and consecutively, by B. D. Townsend, special attorney for the Department of Justice. "The provisions of the grants restricting the manner of sales," says Mr. Townsend in his report, "have never been respected. The lands have been sold to any person, whether settler or speculator, in as large quantities as possible and at the highest prices possible. In making sales the railroad has always observed the law of supply and demand and has never obeyed the law of Congress."

The very purpose for which Congress inserted the restrictions in the grants—to prevent speculation in the land by the railroad and others in large quantities and creation of a great estate—the railroad has thwarted by ignoring the restrictions and asserting absolute ownership of the land. And now a vast proprietorship is in the hands of Harriman, which he announces he will keep.

The people of Oregon long have needed the information contained in the report of Mr. TOWNSEND. The railroad has sold only 15 per cent of the land that has passed out of its hands in compliance with the granting acts. It now holds in violation of those acts, refusing to sell, 2,080,306.44 acres, or 72 per cent of what it has received from the Government. It has sold only 4½ per cent in compliance with the law.

The report shows that the land patented to the railroad amounts to 2,894,215.26 acres, and that the railroad has filed selections for 300,000 acres more; that the railroad has sold 610,215.40 acres and contracted to sell 203,693.42 acres additional, a total of 813,908.82; that it has sold in compliance with the acts of Congress—as to $2.50 an acre price limit and 160-acre quantity limit to each purchaser—127,418.57 acres; that it has sold within the acreage limit of 160 acres to each purchaser, but exceeding the $2.50 an acre price, only 170,561.63, and has sold in excess of the 160-acre limit 515,928.62 acres. Of the last-named total 363,991.50 were purchased by thirty-eight individuals, in quantities exceeding 2,000 by each purchaser, in the last ten years, since the demand for timber land has been active.

In the total of conveyances only 1,947 sales have complied with the $2.50 an acre and 160-acre limits, and 3,376 sales have violated those restrictions. These totals do not take into account sales in which several deeds were made to one purchaser. Were this done the number of sales obeying the law would be somewhat smaller than 1,947. Between the years 1890 and 1902 the railroad sold 400,000 acres to timbermen and speculators in quantities exceeding 1,000 acres to each purchaser. Late in 1902 the railroad adopted the policy of refusing to sell, and in September, 1907, Mr. Harriman, in a speech at Oakland, Cal., announced that this policy would be permanent.

In 1891 the railroad ceased giving warranty deeds (bargain and sale deeds) and thereafter used the quitclaim form, thereby freeing itself from liability should title be menaced, as now seems likely to occur in cases of transfers in violation of the granting acts.

In the sales so far made, inclusive of deeds given and contracts to convey title yet pending, the average purchase price per acre has been $5.42, realizing approximately $4,500,000. If the terms of the granting acts had been observed, the railroad would have received for all the land not more than $8,000,000. But it now asserts absolute ownership of the remaining lands, amounting to 2,080,306 acres and assessed for taxes in 1906 at $18,000,000. Up to the present year the railroad has paid $1,000,000 in taxes on the land. Up to 1891 the total taxes paid were but $75,000. More than one-half the $1,000,000 has been paid since 1902. In that year the railroad refused to sell any more land. Then assessors began marking up the land like other holdings. "In other words," says the report, "the greater portion of the taxes paid by the railroad company down to the present time have been incurred by it as a direct result of its own violation of the law. It is difficult to see how any equities can be predicated upon these facts." The total taxes paid by the railroad do not average more than 40 cents an acre.

Here, then, are facts that the people and the Government long have wanted. They reveal a long train of fraud reaching back thirty-five years. This fraud should be terminated. The railroad should be forced to release the lands still in its clutches, either by forfeiture or by order to sell them in obedience to the conditions of the grants. Early adoption of Senator FULTON'S resolution in the House is hoped for and then immediate proceedings in the courts.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS.

On this subject I insert the following from Senate Document No. 279:

The grants placed in the hands of a single proprietor nearly one-half of the lands of western Oregon, subject to conditions, however, intended to insure the distribution of the land in small quantities among the producing class. Notwithstanding these conditions, the greater portion of the land still remains in the hands of a single proprietor, which refuses to sell it, develop it, or improve it; simply holding it to share the benefits which shall result from the labor of others. The effect of these conditions upon commercial development does not require demonstration.

A large part of the land which has in this manner been placed beyond the reach of the American settler is considered by those most familiar with its character to be well adapted to make attractive homes for thousands of our citizens, with abundant opportunity for profitable industry.

In this connection it is proper to consider that the Oregon and California Railroad Company is now a part of a well-organized transportation system, which controls the commerce of approximately one-third of the United States. So far as western Oregon is concerned, this railroad system not only holds an absolute monopoly of transportation, but, through the manipulation of the land grant, it practically controls production.

The following facts are significant: The present transportation facilities of western Oregon are taxed to their full capacity in handling the products of the country. If the railroad company should abandon its present policy and dispose of its land grant to those who would develop it and subject it to productive industry, it is certain that the increased production of the country would be so greatly in excess of the present transportation facilities that competing transportation lines would be attracted to that State. It is equally certain that, with the Southern Pacific interests controlling substantially one-half of the land, no other transportation company, however formidable, is likely to venture into that territory to engage in competition with a system which virtually controls not only transportation, but also production. More than four-fifths of the land grant now held by the railroad company is situated in southern Oregon. At the time the railroad company withdrew its lands from sale, in 1902, southern Oregon was developing rapidly. It was largely this development which taxed the capacity of the existing transportation facilities.

NATURE OF THE LANDS.

These lands are of varied kinds—timbered, agricultural, mining, horticultural, and grazing. While I have not been over all of it, I have seen large portions. The lands lie in the lesser valleys, on the foothills, and on the slopes of the Coast Range and the Cascade Mountains. Even much of the timbered land can be used for agricultural and horticultural purposes, when cleared; and in many portions of it there are fertile open spaces. My information leads me to believe that a considerable portion of it can be used for settlement. Yet the nature of the lands, whether timbered, mineral, horticultural, agricultural, or grazing, can furnish no justification for a violation of the provisions of the law, and especially when tenders of purchase have been made in large numbers to the grantees according to law and sales refused. All kinds of lands are valuable elements in the general development and were reserved to the public use without distinction.

THE LANDS ARE IN DEMAND.

Hundreds of offers have been made by persons desiring to purchase these lands. Such offers have been made by responsible parties, and in many instances have been accompanied by a tender of the full price, as fixed in the law, and the intending purchasers have been willing to comply with the terms of the grant.

REASON FOR THE RESOLUTION.

Senate joint resolution No. 48 asks that the Attorney-General may be given authority to seek all proper remedies in the courts, including forfeiture. The resolution determines no rights but leaves all questions without prejudice to be determined by the courts. It was deemed necessary that the grantor, Congress, should definitely assert its right to reenter, if the remedy of forfeiture is to be decided by the courts to be the proper remedy against the grantees. This is the sole reason for asking Congress to pass the resolution. The resolution was prepared by the Department of Justice, which possesses information equaled in thoroughness only by that of the grantees. After long and adequate deliberation it decided to ask the specific instruction and authority stated in the resolution.

While the resolution recites that "suit or suits" shall be brought, in the discretion of the Attorney-General, it does so that it may not be contended that the Government has waived any right while asking special authorization under the resolution.

The Committee on the Public Lands of this House says, in House Report No. 1301, just issued:

Upon this view of the case the Attorney-General investigated the law concerning his authority to claim forfeiture on behalf of the United States. The Constitution commits the disposition of the public domain to Congress. This includes the power to annex conditions subsequent to a grant, and it is quite probable that a forfeiture for a breach of a condition imposed by Congress can only be claimed by the same authority. Therefore the Attorney-General has requested that Congress shall remove all doubt upon the subject by specifically authorizing him to claim forfeiture on behalf of the United States in suits about to be commenced.

It should be noted that the most important purpose of the resolution is to authorize a claim of forfeiture. The resolution does not arbitrarily declare a forfeiture, but authorizes the courts to ascertain whether the United States is entitled to a forfeiture, and if it so finds, to enforce the same. The Attorney-General already possesses ample authority to assert all other remedies on behalf of the United States. While the resolution directs the Attorney-General to enforce all rights and remedies, including that of forfeiture, it was drawn in this form to preclude any possibility of a construction that other rights and remedies were waived, it being expected that the Attorney-General will urge all remedies which exist in favor of the Government.

In another place in the same report it is said:

After a complete investigation of the facts the Department of Justice concluded to institute suit to enforce the rights and remedies of the United States in the premises. The Attorney-General has ample authority under existing laws to invoke all these remedies except the remedy of forfeiture, concerning which considerable doubt exists. The object of the resolution is to remove this doubt.

STATUS OF PURCHASERS FROM THE GRANTEES.

A large number of amendments have been proposed and considered, but the Department of Justice has been unable to approve any of them. An amendment that would confirm title in purchasers of large quantities of the land would probably, in its opinion, result in defeating action against the railroad for the lands still undisposed of. There may be unknown contracts now in existence, as in the past, conveying the remaining lands as a body or large parts thereof. There is also involved in the effect of any proposed special validation of titles to large purchasers at this time, an early reorganization of the railroad company, and a mortgage made in 1887. The uncertainty on these points is a very serious matter. Until the suit is instituted and the real situation is ascertained, it seems impossible to know what can be and ought to be done in the interest of those who have purchased from the railroad in material violation of the law, without at the same time impairing the rights of the Government as against the grantees.

Moreover, it is understood that there is now under consideration, and to be submitted later as a separate resolution, a resolution which will afford all necessary protection to the purchasers in good faith from the grantees, and which will be mutually satisfactory to the purchasers and to the Department of Justice.

Members of the delegation from Oregon have deliberated over many amendments to the resolution, concerning the large purchasers, with the Department of Justice. They have considered it advisable, however, to support such proposals only as may be approved by the Department, lest the case of the Government against the undisposed-of lands should be weakened or defeated. The probability of large transfers, secretly and recently made in violation of the law, constitutes an element of great danger. Amendments may excuse the railroad for past violations of and from future compliance with the law. Purchasers from the grantees, as I understand, will not be affected by the passage of the resolution. Their status will remain unchanged. As pointed out by Judge Ballinger and in the printed hearings before the committee, action against them, if any be taken, will be to have their conveyances set aside. Should such action be brought it must be decided by the court, which will take into consideration all the facts and circumstances and considerations of public policy in arriving at its conclusion.

The resolution is a formal declaration by the sovereign of its intention to reenter if such is decided by the courts to be its right and the best remedy.

CONCERNING LANDS SOLD.

As I have said, there are nearly 300,000 acres the titles to which, I understand, will never be questioned. I think they can not be questioned. There are some 500,000 acres sold in large quantities. Upon many of these large purchases sawmills have been erected, or they are the sources of log supplies for mills. Many mills have built expensive plants, including logging roads. They are valuable and flourishing industries. The purchasers affirm they bought in good faith and supposed they were getting a good title. Upon this supposition they have made their improvements. I find no wish on the part of anyone to do an injustice, but a desire on the part of all to do all things that are right and equitable under the circumstances.

The purchasers of lands in large quantities from the grantees uniformly assert their belief in the validity of their titles. If they are correct, they have nothing to fear in any event. It seems quite possible, by stipulation, to arrive at a speedy determination of any questions relating to their holdings. Should there be found any case or cases where for any reason the courts could not afford adequate relief, Congress can do so when specific information has been presented.

The Committee on the Public Lands of this House, which has held long and exhaustive hearings, at which all interests were heard, and which has carefully considered all questions involved, in their Report No. 1301, dated March 24, 1908, say:

Many arguments were advanced by these purchasers to support their claim for protection at this time. The subject was thoroughly discussed before the committee. A number of these large purchasers were represented in person, by officers, and by counsel, and the Department of Justice participated in the hearing. The following general features were developed:

First. There is no uniformity in respect to the circumstances under which these large sales were made. It is impossible to define circumstances which were common to all of these cases. The most that probably can be said is that some of them bought the land in violation of the law, but ignorant that the purchases were unlawful.

Second. Every defense urged by these purchasers will be considered by a court of equity, and, if sufficient under the rules of equity, the rights of all parties will be amply protected by the court.

Third. The railroad company was reorganized early in its history, and as it is a purchaser from the company which originally became vested with the grant any amendment of the resolution protecting purchasers would be equally available to the railroad company. Moreover, on July 1, 1887, a mortgage of $20,000,000 was placed upon the grant and the other property of the company by the railroad company, and each of the amendments proposed would have validated this mortgage and proven an effective obstruction to any suit against the railroad company.

Fourth. It is inadvisable for Congress or any Department of the Government to recognize in advance any equitable or legal rights growing out of these unlawful sales, in view of the fact that the Department of Justice proposes to base its suit against the railroad company upon these unlawful sales.

Fifth. Congress will have ample power to grant any relief to any parties if the final decree rendered shall appear to be harsh or oppressive, and Congress will then have the benefit of a full development of all of the facts and circumstances of these transactions.

It was urged on behalf of these purchasers that in all previous resolutions and acts of Congress directing suits for forfeitures, saving clauses were annexed in favor of innocent purchasers; but it was pointed out by the Department of Justice that in all such cases the ground of forfeiture was not based upon unlawful sales. Upon all former occasions the ground of forfeiture consisted of fraudulent representations as to the construction or completion of the road or some other transaction to which the purchaser was not a party, and in those cases the sales themselves were not in violation of law; but in this case the sales were unlawful and constitute the very ground for the claim of forfeiture. It is apparent that the former acts and resolutions relating to forfeitures furnish no precedent for this case. It is quite clear that Congress should not direct a claim of forfeiture upon the ground that unlawful sales have been made and at the same time in any manner recognize the validity of those sales.

This is a very important matter. A very plain and at the same time a very salutary law has been very flagrantly violated. The Department of Justice has requested Congress to remove every obstacle to the enforcement of the law. It is imperative that Congress should not, in attempting to do so, impose a still greater obstacle and take the risk of destroying whatever rights and remedies the people now have. Even though it be true that parties bought large quantities of these lands through ignorance of the law, they certainly are not in a position to ask Congress to destroy or impair any rights or remedies the Government has against the railroad company. Whatever consideration Congress may ultimately extend to these purchasers, it is clear that the rights of the people must be paramount in the present action of Congress and that no private interests ought to claim consideration in a way that would be to the detriment of the interests of the people, particularly when their equities can and will have full consideration by the courts.

NOT TO RELEASE THE RAILROAD.

It is vital that there should be no release of the Government's interests in the lands still held by the railroad company, for if they are released it amounts to a defeat of the wise and prudent terms of the grant and would be a gift at this time to the company of 2,300,000 acres of land, 3,600 square miles, exceeding the combined areas of Rhode Island and Delaware, three-fourths that of Connecticut, nearly half that of New Jersey, two-fifths that of Massachusetts, and exceeding one-third that of either New Hampshire or Vermont. Its value is more than $35,000,000. Such a gift can be justified on no grounds whatever. It would be a permanent and serious detriment to our prosperity. The company has persistently ignored its obligations, and recently, in the person of its chief officer, openly repudiated them.

WHAT WILL BECOME OF THE LAND?

If the courts decide that the terms of the grant shall be enforced by specific performance, then the lands will be open to the citizens of the United States under those terms. If forfeiture is declared, then the lands return to the public domain and will be subject to the existing laws and the power of Congress to dispose of the public domain. The question as to the nature of the titles to this land having now become a matter of general public knowledge, it is necessary that the matter be determined as quickly as possible and the questions involved set at rest.

UNLAWFULLY HELD OUT OF USE.

Here is a body of land specifically reserved by Congress for homes for the people. Unlawfully it is a forbidden land. Those who desire to occupy it appeal to the Government to break down the barriers. The people resident in Oregon urge the natural right to grow in numbers and to the opportunity for developing their great natural resources. Oregon is a splendid land. Moses from Pisgah's height never beheld land of equal promise.

We, the people of Oregon, in behalf of our present and future citizenship, ask of Congress to instruct the proper authority to render this land available for the habitations of men.

OUR COUNTRY.

The United States is a great country. While we have only one-fourteenth of the area of the world and one-seventeenth of its population, we carry one-ninth of its commerce and have created one-fourth of its wealth. We have one-half of the total railroad mileage. We produce yearly one-third of all mining products, one-fourth of all manufactures in value, and one-fifth of all agricultural products. The population has increased since 1860 from 31,000,000 to 87,000,000; the wealth has increased from $16,000,000,000 to $108,000,000,000—that is, in forty-seven years the increase in population has been 56,000,000 and the increase of our wealth has been $92,000,000,000. We ask that Oregon shall have the opportunity to share fully in this unexampled growth and prosperity.

OUR APPEAL.

Oregon is a land whose beauty and charm possess the souls of her people. They love her dearly. She justly demands their devotion and bountifully repays their toil. She gladly welcomes those who come and rejoices in their prosperity. Although she has made excellent advancement in the past, and is now rapidly increasing in wealth and population, there is a serious and unlawful restriction on her progress. It ought to be removed. She appeals to her sister States for the assistance they alone can give. She asks only the fair enforcement of the laws, the rendition of justice and equity to all concerned, the protection of all rights, and that all of these things shall be done by an impartial court. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and yield it to Mr. SCOTT, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

During the above,

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like permission to put this in the RECORD with other documents of the kind concerning this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to insert certain documents in his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

At the conclusion of the remarks,

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the chairman of the committee [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GODWIN].

Mr. GODWIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GODWIN. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill here directing the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report to Congress upon the following subjects: The location and area of lands in my district that are swamp and overflowed, and susceptible of being drained and made fit for agriculture; the value and effect of drainage on such land and on the public health and upon agriculture; existing legislation of the different States and localities on the subject of drainage and operations thereunder; foreign drainage policies and their results, and the relation of the Federal Government to local authorities and legislation on said subject.

I am very much interested in the reclamation of the swamp lands in my State, and especially in the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor. But of course I do not wish to appear selfish. I would like to see a general drainage bill passed before the end of this session. I believe there is no subject before this House that deserves greater consideration than legislation looking to the draining of the swamp lands of this country.

The farmers desire to know how they shall procure Federal aid to reclaim their swamp lands. Drainage bills have been introduced here, but Congress has failed to pass them. Why is it that Congress will not commit the Government to the policy of drainage when it has committed the Government to the policy of irrigation? The reclamation of the swamp lands is the antithesis of the irrigation of arid lands. There is too little water on the land above, and there is too much below. If the Federal Government, by act of Congress, is irrigating the arid lands of seventeen States in the West, where there is too little water above, why should it not, by act of Congress, drain the lands in the Eastern States, where there is too much water below?

I desire to read a short extract from the last report of the honorable Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson:

> The drainage of the swamp overflowed lands in the humid parts of the United States would extend or greatly improve agriculture over an area almost equal to that of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio. This makes farm drainage a matter of national interest and importance.

Now, the Secretary says that drainage would "extend or greatly improve" the condition of the farmers of this country, and I ask why it is that the party in power should delay drainage legislation? You will note that the Secretary says that drainage laws would "greatly improve agriculture over an area almost equal to that of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio," and still drainage bills have been introduced here session after session in the interests of the farmers of this country, and the majority party has permitted Congress to adjourn year after year without passing a single act, and when the farmers ask, "What did you do for us in the way of passing drainage laws?" the answer is, "Nothing!" You will note further that the Secretary says, "This makes farm drainage a matter of national importance." Now, I respectfully submit that if the reclamation of the swamp lands of this country has become a question of national importance, and we have no reason to doubt that it has, this Congress—I mean, this session—should not adjourn before it grants the relief desired by the people.

It has been ascertained by a recent examination by the Committee on Public Lands that the area of swamp land demanding immediate drainage legislation is approximately 50,000,000 acres. The reclamation of this area would increase the land values of the drainage districts more than $5,000,000,000, and will increase the annual crop values more than $1,500,000,000.

If it is possible to subdivide this enormous area into 40-acre farms it will supply 2,500,000 families with homes, and it will put 12,000,000 people upon lands that are now practically worthless. It is safe to say that those families will spend $2,000 in houses and equipments and improvement for their farms. This will cause an expenditure on the waste lands of to-day of more than $5,000,000,000. An average family of five will spend $600 per year. That will mean to the business interests an increased trade of $1,500,000,000 annually over what is now enjoyed.

These vast areas, scattered throughout the country, and many right at the doors of our great cities, offer an opportunity for relieving the overcrowding of cities. Their nearness to centers of population is assurance that when made habitable they will in a measure turn the pendulum of the population from the city back to the farm. On these farms there will be no isolation, no loneliness, and all will be happy. The fertility of soil and the nearness to markets assure dense population, with all the comforts and luxuries of the town and with the healthfulness and freedom of the farm and country.

In many sections of our country requiring reclamation by drainage nearly all the lands cultivable in localities where moisture is supplied by rainfall are already occupied.

The demand for land is increasing every year by the natural increase of native born and by the addition of 1,000,000 foreigners annually who must be provided with homes. What are we to do? We are not making more land, but the population is constantly growing more and more and the demand for land is growing greater and greater as the years go by.

It is beyond controversy that our people must be furnished opportunity to secure homes. Every year this becomes more and more the nation's duty. The greatest and noblest mission of any nation is to settle its citizens in comfort and plenty in homes of their own. As I said, the Government has set itself squarely upon the work of making homes in the desert, and already the sage-brush plain has become peopled with home makers waiting the turning on of the water to engage upon the work of building an empire in a region long vacant and voiceless.

National drainage is as important a work as national irrigation, and when undertaken it will show equal benefits. To-day our vast areas of swamp lands contribute nothing to the nation's wealth or happiness. They are a barrier to growth and development. North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Arkansas, Virginia, Maryland, Indiana, New Jersey, and many other States contain large areas of swamp and overflowed lands, the existence of which is a menace to human prosperity, health, and life.

We have already reached that period of our progress when a study of the conditions of this uninhabited region is imperative, and when a policy of reclamation on the part of the Government is demanded by all citizens who have the general welfare of the nation at heart.

We have many large swamps in North Carolina requiring reclamation by drainage, and one of the largest swamps of my State is of historic interest. It was known and the drainage of its fertile lands discussed in colonial times and in the early days of our country. The famous Irish poet, Tom Moore, while on a visit to the city of Norfolk, in Virginia, in 1803, wrote his famous ballad, entitled "The Lake of the Dismal Swamp."

I said the Federal Government is committed to the policy of irrigation. An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of said lands was passed by the Fifty-seventh Congress and approved June 17, 1902. This act set aside all moneys received from the sale of public lands in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming as a special fund in the Treasury, to be known as the "reclamation fund," and to be used "in the examination and survey for and the construction and maintenance of irrigation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters for the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands in said States and Territories."

It will be seen that the provisions of this act did not apply to all public-land States in which the Government still holds lands. The States not included in this list may have been omitted, because very little public land is left in them or because they contained little or no land that needed irrigation. It can not be held, however, that by the enactment of this law the Federal Government was simply providing for the irrigation of its own land. The act provides for charges upon lands in private ownership, the charges to be sufficient to repay the money expended by the Government, or at least the part assessed as the equitable proportion that each body of land in private ownership should bear, and to be paid in not more than ten yearly installments. In other words, to the extent that irrigation projects benefit private individuals the Government practically lends the money, to be repaid one-tenth each year for ten years. The money thus repaid goes into the irrigation fund, to be used again in irrigating other lands.

Thus we have the Government, for purposes of irrigation, practically advancing money to individuals. The Secretary of the Interior was required before undertaking any irrigation to first have an examination made to determine if the project was practicable. If a favorable report was made, he was authorized to let contracts for the work.

But if the operation of this law had been confined to the States for which it was first enacted, all public-land States—that is, States whose land was originally owned by the Government and whose private holdings all were derived originally from grants from the Government—it might be claimed that this act was passed with the idea that the Government was spending its money for the purpose of improving its own property and that the improvement of private property was only incidental. But the Fifty-ninth Congress passed an act extending the provisions of this law to the State of Texas.

In Texas the Federal Government does not own one foot of land, except such as it may have bought, just as you or I could buy it. The lands of Texas never belonged to the United States. The magnificent domain of that imperial State was the property of the State, just as was the case with my State, and the others of the thirteen that were the parents of the Union instead of its children. On the idea that the Federal Government is expending its money for the improvement of its own property, there is no more reason why it should irrigate Texas than lands in North Carolina.

The Government is spending money for irrigation in Texas and other States west of the Mississippi, because such work is needed there. It is not spending it in North Carolina and other States east of the Mississippi, because it is not needed for this purpose. In the States whose arid deserts the Government is transforming into gardens of blossoms and bloom, the Government is doing the work, because it can not be done by private individuals.

The water has to be led from its source of supply many miles to reach parts of dry area, giving productiveness to the thirsting soil and life to vegetation all along the way, and extending broad trails of verdure into the desert. Take the case of an owner who lives 30, 40, or 50 miles from the source of supply. He could not get the water; to do so he would have to dig miles of ditches through other men's holdings before it could reach his land at all. He would have to get their consent and probably pay out more than his land would be worth, even when benefited by irrigation.

So the Government steps in and does a work beneficial to all. It is amply able to do it, and those who are benefited pay in easy installments for what they get.

We need not now approve or disapprove the policy of irrigation. It has been adopted. It is in operation and will continue. Only seventeen States and Territories are benefited by it. The others derive no benefits. The law is sectional in its operation and sectional in its benefit, but it is sectional only because one section alone needs work of this kind.

And yet, if we take a narrow view, this irrigation law not only does not benefit the States to which it is not applied, but to some extent it actually hurts them. By converting the deserts of the West into areas of the greatest fertility, the Federal Government is using its influence to keep turned to the West a tide of immigration that otherwise might turn southward. We are not losing, appreciably, on account of the irrigation of the West, but to the extent that if it affects our progress at all it affects it unfavorably.

What, then, shall we do? Demand that irrigation work be stopped? Our demand would not stop its course if we were willing to place ourselves in opposition to the interests of sister States. What we should do is this: Ask the Federal Government to do as much for us as it is doing for others. To this we have a right, and we should assert our right.

But it must be done in another line. We do not need irrigation. The Creator attended to that when He made the land wherein we live. From the mountains that lift their heads higher into the skies than any others on the Atlantic slope to the strip of sand that holds back the battling billows of the ocean there is no desert, there is no arid spot. The rains descend in due time and the unfailing streams wind their ribbons of deeper verdure through a smiling land as their waters go from their birthplace in the mountains to their rest in the bosom of the sea.

Instead of deserts we have swamps. As an original proposition it is just as proper for the Federal Government to expend money in draining swamps as in irrigating arid tracts. Since the States that need irrigation work are receiving it from the Federal Government the claims to drainage of such as need it become stronger. Their claim becomes a right that can not be denied, except through gross injustice. It is the right to equal treatment that equal members of this great Union have.

If the Government proposes to assume the attitude of a father to his children and irrigate the lands of the West, I, for one, insist that North Carolina is not a stepchild. She is as lovely a daughter as any in the family, and is entitled to as good as there is in the house.

The reports of the field operations of the Bureau of Soils of the Department of Agriculture contain much information about the swamps of North Carolina. The area of swamp lands is given as from 3,000 to 5,000 square miles. It must be nearer the latter than the former figure, for the area of what is called Hyde County Swamp is given as nearly 3,000 square miles. This swamp covers part of five counties. It could be easily drained because of its deviation above the adjacent surface.

Some portions have been already reclaimed. Some of this reclaimed land which has been in cultivation one hundred years produces 50 bushels of corn per acre without fertilization and without rotation. No State in the Union averages anything like this yield. The largest average production per acre ever known in the United States was only 30.8 bushels. Professor Emmons says of this land:

> The swamp soils of North Carolina show a greater power of endurance than the prairie soils of Illinois.

I tell you these facts, my friends, not because you do not already know them, but because I wish you to know that the value of this land is recognized beyond the limits of my State.

The swamp land of North Carolina is nearly as great in area as that of the little Kingdom of Saxony, which has nearly 5,000,000 people. The swamps of this State, if drained, could easily sustain a larger population than the entire State has at the present time.

They would be capable of growing a vast variety of products. The rice produced in my district is superior to any other grown in the United States. Its superiority is so well known and so generally conceded that the planters in South Carolina and Georgia have for generations been buying it for seed.

It is not generally known, but it is a fact that, looked at in one way and in the best way, North Carolina is the second cotton-producing State in the Union. Of course, the majority of the cotton-growing States produce more cotton than North Carolina, but this State produces more per acre than any other, except Oklahoma, and the productiveness is rapidly increasing. Years ago North Carolina was far down the list, not only in number of bales grown, but also in product per acre; but she has been moving forward so fast that, in the latter respect, she is now next to the top. North Carolina is one of the three States that produce more than half a bale of cotton to the acre. These lands, besides producing an enormous yield of the common variety, would be suitable for the sea-island cotton, which is worth about twice as much as upland cotton per pound.

But the chief value of the drained lands in my State, and especially in my district, would be as the market garden for the large cities of the North Atlantic seaboard. Their products, if moved by express, could leave their nearest market towns at sunset and be ready for the breakfast table in Washington or Baltimore the next morning, and could reach Philadelphia and New York by noon. The fringe of country down the Atlantic coast is peculiarly adapted to market gardening, not only because of its fertility of soil, but also because of its climate and its proximity to the great markets. In this part of the country isothermal lines do not run east and west, but northeast and southwest. Eastern North Carolina is warmer than northern Georgia or Alabama. It has about the same temperature as middle Georgia and Alabama. Its garden products are ready for the markets at about the same time as those of middle Georgia and Alabama, and are not more than half as far from them in distance or time. On this account market gardening has already become an important industry in this section, and with the addition of the 2,500,000 acres of the most fertile land in America, or the part of it that could profitably be devoted to vegetables, it could supply the large cities with vegetables earlier than the sections farther north, and at less cost for transportation than the sections farther south.

Drainage is of vast importance to the people of North Carolina, but in my district it is too vast an undertaking to be attempted by individual landowners, just as irrigation in the West is too vast an undertaking to be attempted by individual landowners there.

Generally speaking, the swamps of North Carolina are high enough above the sea level and above the neighboring water courses to make their drainage, while out of the reach of individual citizens, a small matter when considered as an undertaking by the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, I have been speaking largely for the entire State, and while I do not wish to voice the feelings or express the wishes of my worthy colleagues from North Carolina upon this floor, I feel that they will most heartily indorse all I have said. I believe that my district has a larger area requiring reclamation by drainage than any other district in the State, and, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the class of citizens I represent.

My district in North Carolina is peopled by representatives of sturdy races, whose struggles for liberty and freedom date back to periods before the Western World had a place in the dreams of men. It is peopled by men and women from the countries of Europe, who, oppressed in their own lands, long looked forward to American development that they might for themselves and children enjoy that freedom and that liberty of which they had heard and dreamed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SMITH] is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to talk for a few moments in a general way concerning the history of agriculture and its present material value, and of how the farmer has fared at the hands of the Government, and, lastly, of agricultural education.

George Washington was a man whose common sense amounted to genius, and this feature of his intellect, with a moral courage that may have been rivaled by the best men of history, but never excelled, wrote his name on the very highest arches of fame, there to shine forever and grow brighter as time goes by.

In his first message to Congress, January 8, 1790, he expressed the hope that the—advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation, nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in the opinion that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. * * * Whether this desirable object will best be promoted by affording aids to seminaries already established, or by the institution of a national university, or by any other expedients will be worthy of a place in the deliberations of the Legislature.

Notice that of the great triple interests which he mentions agriculture is first, and he links the promotion of agriculture with the university, which means that this industry has a scientific side of interest and value.

In his eighth and last message to Congress (1798), stressing the importance of agriculture, he says:

It will not be doubted that with reference either to individual or national welfare agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population and other circumstances of maturity, this truth becomes more apparent and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up, supported by the public purse; and to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety? Among the means which have been employed to this end none have been attended with greater success than the establishment of boards (composed of proper characters) charged with collecting and diffusing information, and enabled by premiums and small pecuniary aids to encourage and assist a spirit of discovery and improvement. This species of establishment contributes doubly to the increase of improvement by stimulating to enterprise and experiment, and by drawing to a common center the results everywhere of skill and observation, and spreading them thence over the whole nation. Experience accordingly has shown that they are very cheap instruments of immense national benefits.

On March 1, 1785, was organized at Philadelphia the first society for the promotion of agriculture, and George Washington and Benjamin Franklin were elected members of it.

I can not futher pursue the early history of the beginning of a growing sentiment for agriculture. I merely mention it to emphasize the importance of the subject. Agriculture is always put first in speeches, for there is where it belongs in sentiment and reason, but in the selfish and sometimes tainted efforts of men to lay hold of that which is not theirs, through the forms of law of their own contrivance, agriculture has been in practice sent to the rear, which is a reversal of the natural order of things and can be but temporary.

I shall, after looking at the farmer and his business from a political standpoint, devote whatever time is left to a general review of agricultural education, stressing particularly its study in the common schools, and what the country, through Congress, owes to the farmer in the aid of better educational facilities.

FARM PRODUCTION AND THE SURPLUS.

In this country there are now engaged in agricultural pursuits about 11,000,000 persons, more than one-tenth of the entire population of the nation. The value of all farm property, as shown by the census of 1900, was considerably over $20,000,000,000, as the following table, furnished to me by the Secretary of Agriculture, exemplifies:

Year.	Number of farms.	Number of acres in farms, 1880–1900.
		Total.	Improved.	Unimproved.
1900	5,737,372	838,591,774	414,498,447	424,093,287
1890 [a]	4,564,641	623,218,619	357,616,755	265,601,834
1880 [a]	4,008,907	536,081,835	284,771,042	251,310,793

The value of farm property in 1900, as given by the census, is shown below:

Value of farm property—1880–1900.

Year.	All farm property.	Farm land with improvements, including buildings.	Implements and machinery.	Live stock.
1900	$20,439,901,164	[a] $16,614,647,491	$749,775,970	[b] $3,075,477,703
1890	16,082,267,689	13,279,252,649	494,247,467	[c] 2,308,767,573
1880	12,180,501,538	10,197,096,776	406,520,055	[c] 3,576,884,707

[a] Value of land, with improvements, except buildings, $13,058,007,995; value of buildings, $3,556,639,496. The Twelfth Census was the first to collect separate statistics of buildings on farms.

[b] Including value of live stock on ranges as well as on farms. Value of domestic animals, $2,979,197,586. This figure is more nearly comparable than that in table with the returns for value of live stock at earlier censuses.

[c] Including estimated value of live stock on ranges.

The value of farm products in 1899 was given by the census, viz:

Value of products.

Product.	Total.	Fed to live stock.	Not fed to live stock.
Total	$4,717,069,973	$974,940,616	$3,742,129,357
Animal products	1,718,365,561	----------	1,718,365,561
Crops [a]	2,998,704,412	974,940,616	2,023,763,796

[a] Includes forest products.

The number of persons at least 10 years of age engaged in agricultural pursuits in 1900 was classified by the census as follows:

Occupation.	Total.	Male.	Female.
Agricultural laborers	4,410,877	3,747,668	663,209
Dairymen and dairywomen	10,875	9,983	892
Farmers, planters, and overseers	5,674,875	5,367,169	307,706
Gardeners, florists, etc	61,788	58,928	2,860
Lumbermen and raftsmen	72,020	71,920	100
Stock raisers, herders, and drovers	84,988	83,056	1,932
Turpentine farmers and laborers	24,735	24,454	281
Wood choppers	36,075	35,962	113
Other agricultural pursuits	5,532	5,289	243
Total	10,381,765	9,404,429	977,336

The wealth production on farms in 1907 reached the magnificent sum of $7,412,000,000, not including dairy products, which amounted to $800,000,000. The animals sold from farms for the year 1907 were worth about $1,270,000,000, aggregating the grand total of $9,482,000,000.

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS.

Of this production for the year ending June 30, 1907, the domestic exports of farm products were valued at $1,500,000,000, four-fifths of which were plant products, and chief among them was cotton with the port value of $482,000,000. The grain and grain products exported were valued at $184,000,000, the unmanufactured tobacco at $33,000,000, and oil cake and oil-cake meal at $26,000,000, the vegetable oils at $20,000,000, and the fruits at $17,000,000.

Animals and animal products were exported to the value of $255,000,000, mostly composed of packing-house products, worth $203,000,000, or only $4,000,000 under the high-water mark of 1906. Exported live animals were valued at $41,000,000 and dairy products at $6,600,000.

These figures I most earnestly commend to the sober consideration of the farmers of the country in order that they may fully realize the significance of the nation's agricultural interests and its national importance from the standpoint of comparison with other great industrial interests.

MANUFACTURING AND MINING INTERESTS.

The manufacturing and mining interests are the next largest, which, in round numbers, aggregate in value approximately $15,000,000,000. There are employed in these industries about 5,500,000 persons as wage-earners. The number of owners of mines and manufactories were approximately 1,000,000 persons, making a total of persons engaged in manufacturing and mining in the neighborhood of 6,500,000.

RAILROAD INTERESTS.

The transportation by railroads is the next largest interest. The gross earnings ending June 30, 1906, on 222,340 miles of railroad amounted to $2,326,000,000, and the net earnings amounted to $788,887,896. The number of the employees for the same time was 1,521,355.

My object in giving these figures is to show how much greater, in point of fact—with no intention, however, to disparage the other great interests so briefly set forth—is the agricultural interest of the country and to emphasize this great difference. These combined figures are stupendous and tell a fairy tale of material growth and prosperity. Yet they do not tell half the story. If the future could only be read for one hundred years hence these figures would dwindle amazingly.

But I must note, in passing, that through land grants and money donations from the Government and people the railroads have received more than a billion dollars to aid in their construction, and that manufacturing and mining have been the particular wards of the Government for more than forty years, by virtue of the high protective tariff, and as such wards have been the recipients of unknown millions, and are yet its tender wards.

But what has the farmer received? Only here and there a homestead of 160 acres, upon which he has been compelled by law to locate, clear up, improve, and build a home, and become the pioneer of the country's growth, accompanied by sacrifice, and the creator of its social life and the provider of raiment and food for the Government's favorites.

EQUAL RIGHTS TO ALL, SPECIAL PRIVILEGES TO NONE.

In this connection I desire briefly to mention the burdens that the farmer and his business have borne for so many years at the hands of the Republican party and its high protective tariff; that, notwithstanding this, the farmer has prospered, and I want to tell you that his prosperity is due to the age, his industry, thrift, and the remarkable fertility of the soil of our great country, and not to the sacred schedules of the Dingley tariff. The Dingley tariff is a fraud and a failure, as the late and continuing Republican panic has demonstrated. My party has always held that a high protective tariff was a monstrous fraud upon the farmers, and this belief is rapidly gaining ground in all parts of the country.

Agricultural implements and household mechanical implements are now sold abroad, after the expense of transportation is added, 20 per cent cheaper than in our own country. This is such common knowledge and so well known to the farmers everywhere that to illustrate it would be a waste of time.

At last, however, the friends of the high protective tariff say that the schedules will be revised at the next sitting of Congress. Whether or not they will be, if the Republican party should prevail at the fall elections, no human being can tell. That the high protective tariff has ever been an incubus upon the farmer can not be successfully gainsaid; and without going into the history of this subject, I merely desire to give briefly some very interesting figures.

In the ten years from 1850 to 1860, when the Walker tariff prevailed, farm property doubled in value, while from 1860 to 1890, when the war tariff ruled for thirty years, farm property barely doubled again. The ten years between 1890 and 1900 marked an increase of nearly 25 per cent. But during this entire period there was an average increase in the value of urban and city property of about 75 per cent.

LITTLE GAIN TO THE FARMER.

And there is more of this picture for the farmer. He ought to frame it and hang it up in his dining room, so that he can study it while enjoying his meals, and he ought to tell his children how kind he has been to all the interests except his own. You will observe that in 1850 the farmer owned more than half of the country, while in 1900 he owned a little more than one-fifth, and to-day he owns scarcely more than one-sixth. The per capita wealth of the farmer remained practically stationary for the forty years between 1860 and 1900, while city property increased in the neighborhood of sixfold.

Of the $78,000,000,000 of wealth growth or increase for forty years between 1860 and 1900, less than one-sixth of it went to the farmers, who made up at that time considerably more than one-third of the population, whereas, on the other hand, of the $9,000,000,000 increase during the ten years between 1850 and 1860 more than 44 per cent of the increase went into the pockets of the farmers. These figures ought to be irrefragable proof of the contention that always has been made by the Democratic party, that high tariff, economically speaking, is the farmer's worst enemy. It is a well-known fact that something like four-fifths of the tariff is paid by the consumer and one-fifth by the exporter and foreign manufacturer. As the farmer is neither an exporter nor a foreign manufacturer, he pays his proportion of the four-fifths of the high tariff, which is robbery.

Without pursuing this subject any further, there can be no doubt but that there would be a marked reduction in the prices of many of the necessary articles of life consumed by the farmer on a reduction of the tariff, which it looks now would come to pass, for I verily believe the Democrats will come into power in 1909. That high tariff is not a panacea for political ills has been forever settled—that panics will come, as Democrats have always contended, when the tariff is sky high, has been also forever settled, and the Republican party has been "knocked silly" on this proposition.

The worst panic that this country has ever witnessed would have been experienced last fall had not the national and State banks seized upon and by force held the reserves that were in the banks throughout the country; and also did the banks, forcibly and without the consent of the depositor, hold the deposits of the country until the storm that lowered so threateningly in November and December had, in a measure, broken. The country banks were forced into this action by the great national banks located at the great financial centers.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION IN AID OF AGRICULTURE.

A number of bills have been introduced in this House for the purpose of aiding the agricultural interests of the country and especially for the purpose of giving aid to agricultural education. The bill that meets my approval in a greater degree than any of the others, and yet is not entirely satisfactory, is the bill introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman wish to yield?

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. I will yield.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. To what gentleman from Minnesota does the gentleman refer?

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I agree with all the gentleman says in reference to the bill, and I suggest it was currently reported and generally believed here that he was taken off of that committee by the Republican Speaker of this House because he had introduced that particular bill.

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. I have understood it to be a fact, that because he introduced a bill looking to a larger diffusion of agricultural education among the masses, and I presume because it called for about $10,000,000 by the way of an appropriation, which could only be for the benefit of the farmers and the agricultural classes of the country, he was let off or taken off of that committee. Whether this is true or not I am not able to say.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The fact is, though, he is off of the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. That is true.

This bill seeks to fix a tax equal to not more than 10 cents per capitum of the population of every State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, respectively, based upon the last census. This would give to Missouri a sum in the neighborhood of $300,000 for the purpose of educating the people in things appertaining to agriculture and home making. I believe that the amount of the appropriation, at this time, is too great. The annual appropriation by the Government, under the terms of this bill, could not be less than $10,000,000, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture through the agricultural colleges and experiment stations of the several States.

Further, the bill requires the establishment of experiment stations in subdivisions of territory not to exceed fifteen counties throughout the States. It seeks to do so much, at once and arbitrarily by force of law, before the country, in my opinion, is ready for it, that the bill from this view point is subject to criticism. The bill is all right as to conception, but we are not prepared for it in its details. In my opinion, if we were ready for the appropriation, it would not be too much. Yea, the farmer is entitled to more when we are prepared to handle it in the right way. But we must grow for several years. However, I am in sympathy with its general purpose, and that is to simulate a deeper interest in the education of the children of to-day in matters pertaining to agricultural pursuits.

It has been currently reported that Mr. DAVIS was taken off the Committee on Agriculture for the reason that he had made his campaign upon a platform in which this bill was the chief plank, and because he had advocated, by correspondence with other Members of Congress, the importance of such a measure, which would redound to the interest of the farmer, especially in the rural districts, as to information valuable to farmers, through the experiment stations and the general diffusion of agricultural education.

HISTORY OF AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION IN MISSOURI PRIOR TO 1887.

I have for a number of years felt a deep interest in agricultural education and in its diversified phases.

Man is a land animal and can live only from the fruits of the soil, and he can build no civilization worthy of the name which shall endure that is not based upon agriculture. The closer his communion with this "open sesame" of life and its evolution the better and happier he lives.

The mysteries of agriculture and its science and its practical side can best be learned in a thoroughly equipped agricultural college, which includes the experimental station and the tillable farm, and such schools, manned with men and women in love with their work, sufficiently skilled in the technique and practical work, will give the highest results in the illimitable field of agriculture.

More than twenty years ago, when a member of the Missouri legislature, I had the honor to offer in the senate of Missouri a resolution. The preamble was rather too explicit in reciting past history with respect to the Congressional land grant of July, 1862, and the fund arising from the sale of lands granted to Missouri. This indulgence in history, however, was necessary to awaken public interest. It was necessary to use language calculated to stir the feelings of the public, and particularly of those personally charged with the sale of these lands and the management of the fund, as well as the management of the agricultural college. Hence, the resolution provoked a heated discussion, which resulted in the appointment of a committee to investigate the affairs of the Agricultural College of Missouri, then a mere department of the State University.

As the preamble of the resolution was regarded as rather too caustic, most of it was stricken out and that remaining was doctored so, when adopted, that it was as follows:

Whereas, from general reports and printed catalogues, some person or persons have changed, or sought to change, the name of the university from the "State University," as provided by the constitution of the State, to that of the "Agricultural College and University of the State:" Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the President of the Senate to make a diligent inquiry into the history of the legislation relative to these lands, and the establishment of the Agricultural and Mechanical College, the number of acres sold and the price per acre, the number of acres leased, and the number of acres yet unsold, the investment of the proceeds arising from the sale and leasing thereof, the kind of bonds and stocks purchased, the management of the agricultural and mechanical department of the university, the number of students, of professors, and their salaries, and everything connected with the history, control, and expenditures of such department; and, further, said committee shall carefully inquire of the board of curators of said university who sought to make the change of name above mentioned by what authority it was sought and for what purpose. Further, said committee shall have power and authority to send for persons as witnesses, for papers and documents, and to administer oaths and do all things necessary to a full and thorough investigation thereof; to employ a stenographer to take all the evidence, oral and documentary, considered important by the committee, and the same report to the Senate at the earliest day possible by resolution, bill, or otherwise, and are further authorized to have said report printed at once for the use of the Senate.

WHAT THE COMMITTEE REPORTED.

This committee met in the university building at Columbia February 4, 1887, and after an investigation of almost a week, spent in taking testimony covering the entire history of the agricultural college, its affairs and management, in due time made a report as to the agricultural college, what it had accomplished, and its future, in the following language:

To the senate and house of representatives of the thirty-fourth general assembly of the State of Missouri:

Your joint committee appointed to investigate the condition of the endowment fund, held in trust by the State for the use and benefit of the agricultural college, which is a department of the State University, beg leave to submit the following statement as part of the report to be hereafter made in full:

* * * * * * *

It will not be disputed but that the evidence taken before the committee shows clearly that the agricultural college has been a failure.

The department has graduated during its fifteen years of existence just sixteen students, and only about three of them are farmers.

There has been paid to this department as interest on bonds and land leases something near $135,000.

Unless some change can be made whereby better results can be obtained, it would be well for the legislature to abolish the law creating the institution.

The fact is, that the agricultural college is so interwoven into the web and woof of the university proper, that it has no identity, no individuality, and, rightfully, no standing at home or abroad. Time has proven that it can not succeed under the present environments and government. Money can not nor never has made a bad government a good one. The agricultural department should be as distinct as the law department or the medical department.

The interest fund would pay a very respectable faculty of professors whose hearts would be in the work, and this should be done, and the thirty-fourth general assembly should be wise and patriotic enough to do it.

Finally, we would recommend that, if the agricultural college can not be reorganized and placed under a different management, with a special faculty, whose purpose it shall be to educate and train the industrial classes for the various practical pursuits of life, it ought to be separated from the university and conducted under a distinct régime and be a distinct college.

It is believed by the committee that it is practical to place the agricultural college under a different management and still leave it a department of the university. Therefore, be it recommended—

M. R. SMITH, Chairman.

This partial report was signed by myself alone for the reason that it was thought to be too radical by the other members of the committee. But subsequent events, which I shall not now discuss, have fully approved of every word and statement made in it, and it is very gratifying to me that this is so.

Later on in the session the whole committee made the following statement as their final report, in the nature of an apology for the old management of the agricultural college:

To the senate and house of representatives of the thirty-fourth general assembly of the State of Missouri:

Your joint committee, which made a partial report of its proceedings herein, beg leave to submit the following as corrective and final:

Actual number of acres outside of railroad belt	260, 305. 22
Number of acres within railroad belt	66, 737. 88
Total number of acres accepted by the State	327, 043. 10
Total number of acres sold	249, 906. 13
Number of acres unsold	78, 136. 97
Sum realized from all sales of land	$322, 741. 65
Auditor's report shows an investment in agricultural funds	$287, 000. 00
Amount of deficit	$35, 741. 65

This deficit, as far as the committee can determine, has been used in the payment of expenses accruing upon the sale of these lands, the investment of the price of the sales, and other contingent expenses.

Also some part was lost by Commissioner Sutherland's defaulting to the amount of $2,800, and possibly more, since Mr. Todd testified that they could not get the books from him, nor a settlement.

The foregoing statements, accounts, and computations we believe to be true and correct, though we have not had the time to make as full an examination as we would like.

The Agricultural College of Missouri has an interest-bearing fund of upward of $400,000, I would say. The exact amount I can not give.

CHANGES FOLLOW INVESTIGATION.

These reports set the public to thinking, and at the next session of the legislature matters at the university, so far as the agricultural department of it was concerned, were vigorously dealt with by a thorough overhauling, and the president of the university lost his position, and yet he was one of the ablest men who ever was at the head of the university. Feeling ran high at the way the agricultural and mechanical department had been managed.

The result, in brief, was what I had recommended in the report signed by myself, that the agricultural college be made an independent department of the university for special work, and not a mere adjunct to it, used and subordinated to the university for its benefit, together with an absorption of its land-grant trust fund in the general educational work of the institution.

This investigation marked the beginning and growth of a school that ranks high and is to-day doing the very best special work along the lines of scientific and practical work in agricultural education.

I shall mention, at the risk of being charged with egotism, that I had the honor to introduce into the Missouri legislature in 1889 the bill for the establishment of the experimental station at Columbia. The experiment station grew out of, and was a part of, the Hatch Act, which passed Congress on March 2, 1887. The farmers of the country never had a better friend in Congress than Hon. William Hatch, of Missouri. The experiment station at Columbia is one of the very best, and is under the able management of Dr. H. J. Waters, who is deeply in love with the greatest educational movement of the age, and one destined to do more for the elevation of the human family than any other in the whole range of educational work.

For a succinct statement of just what the agricultural college was when it was investigated, I submit the following question and the answer to it by Professor Sanborn, then the so-called dean of the faculty of the agricultural college:

Q. Please explain why there are so few attending the agricultural colleges proper, as students?—A. Well, sir, in the first place, they nowhere in America have accepted the agricultural college as a necessity. Lands in this western country have always been so boundless in extent and so fertile that farmers could see no need of any education to enable them to become farmers; in their estimation no special education was required and no agricultural college was needed. This is the first reason, and the second one, in my opinion, is that our agricultural colleges here have never been equipped to do the work that ought to be done. The professor ought to be able to take the boys out on a farm connected with the college and show them the different breeds of stock and test the results of the different kinds of feed, and so forth, and also to show them the different varieties of fruits, cereals, and grasses, and so forth; the State farm here is entirely unequipped, and I have not felt like I could try to induce young men to come here. I have felt that boys coming to such a poor institution would really not take much interest in an agricultural education, and as a man of truth and honor I could not wish to induce them to come under false claims and pretenses; no college in the country could brag of more students than we would have if we were properly equipped. Kansas boasts of 400 students, but that includes everything; in their agricultural college proper they graduated but one last year, while we graduated five; but I say that in the sense in which we educate them they are not exclusively agricultural students. The difficulty is, the farmers of the country are not ready for what I regard the purely agricultural college; they have not been educated up to it yet and are not ready to receive it.

This is ancient history, but it is now and then well to get our bearings to see how far we have traveled and whether in the right direction. Within the last twenty-five years the world has made its decision "that a physical fact is as sacred as a moral principle," as a great educator said fifty years ago.

Upon this principle the character of education is rapidly changing, and to the forefront is being pushed industrial education by men and women of brains and courage, who shall win the very highest achievements for the nation. But I can not pause here to expatiate upon this entrancing subject.

I am anxious to add my meed of aid to help engage the interest of the agricultural classes to avail themselves of the great opportunities offered to them through the Department of Agriculture in Washington and through the agricultural colleges and experimental stations in every State in the Union, and particularly in Missouri.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

In this connection I regard it as appropriate to say something concerning the Department of Agriculture here in Washington. It is without doubt one of the most effective organizations of its kind in the world, and an outline of some of the most important things that it is doing will not be out of place. It is making careful investigations from day to day, through the Weather Bureau, of the condition of the weather of the country with respect to climatological influences on commerce and agriculture, and the results are given to the public daily through bulletins. The Bureau of Animal Industry is also very important, and through an able staff of experts is giving very thorough consideration, as I am informed, to the question of meat inspection, and this is very gratifying, for the reason that meat products go into every home in the land, and hence this work is calculated to protect the health of the people. It is also devoting much time and investigation to the diseases of animals, the importance of which every farmer and stock raiser knows, and is active in the investigation of conditions affecting quarantine measures in this and foreign countries, and also is active on the subject of opening foreign markets for American meat products, all of which is for the advancement of agriculture and the farmer.

The Bureau of Plant Industry is also very important. It would be too tedious to undertake to discuss in detail the work of this Bureau. However, it devotes much time to the study of plant life in its diversified forms; in the introduction of new crops from foreign countries; in the building up of new crop industries, and the improvement of them, as well as the study of the diseases affecting crops.

The great region west of the one hundredth parallel, known as the "Great Plains section," which is rapidly becoming the Mecca for farmers and people from Missouri, Illinois, Iowa, and other States, is being carefully studied by this Bureau for the purpose of determining what crops can be better grown in that section. Wheat growing was begun there something like seven years ago, and I am informed that there were produced last year from 45,000,000 to 50,000,000 bushels of a new wheat, worth in the neighborhood of $40,000,000, and it is expected that this yield will steadily increase.

The fruit industry, which is becoming so important in the Middle West, comes in for careful observation, and I want to say that Missouri stands at the head in this respect. Her orchards, vineyards, and fruit plantations are the best, especially those in the southern and western portions of the State. This Bureau has done valuable service through its scientific investigations of the diseases of fruit and in helping to prevent the same. I am informed also that the Department has been successful in later years in greatly benefiting the fruit growers of the country by offering to them new methods of destroying insects that have heretofore so seriously damaged fruit crops. This work, perhaps, comes more directly under the Bureau of Entomology.

Soil surveys have been and are being made all the time throughout the country, and especially in Missouri, which are regarded as of considerable value. I should not forget also to mentioned the fact that the Office of Public Roads is stimulating and encouraging the improvement of roads, and this is one of the important features of the Department, and yet not enough along this line has been done to be considered of much value; but the future in this respect is encouraging, forecasting it by the bills introduced on road building.

While the Department of Agriculture is fundamentally for research, it is, of course, doing much in a general way. All research work is educational, and I must not forget to mention that this same kind of work is being done by the State experiment stations in a very promising and satisfactory manner.

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION IN MISSOURI AT THIS TIME.

It is with considerable pride that I refer to the fact that Missouri is to the front in many respects in agricultural education, as well as in agricultural production. It has been stated recently upon good authority that nearly one-eighth of all the corn of the United States and more than one-tenth of the corn grown in the world is grown in Missouri.

I believe Missouri has the largest permanent productive school fund of any State in the Union, unless it be Texas. We expend in that State in a single year for schools—public, private, and denominational—about $11,000,000, which is nearly 10 per cent of the entire assessed valuation of the State, and more than four times as much as is expended in all branches of the State government—executive, legislative, and judicial.

The Missouri State University and Agricultural College at Columbia are doing much toward advancing the higher education of the State. The agricultural college, an independent department of the university—and for the valuable work that it is now doing I claim some of the credit—under the able management of Dean Waters has rapidly advanced to the front rank of institutions of this kind in the United States. It is now graduating from twenty-five to forty young men and women every year, some of whom go into professional life as teachers and experts in the agricultural colleges and experiment stations of the country; but many of them, which is possibly more important, go back to the farms and become farmers and centers of influences in their communities for better farm work and a more aggressive and intelligent citizenship. Others become leaders in agricultural work as heads of departments and bureaus in the Government service. Dr. Beverly T. Galloway, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, is a Missourian and from the Agricultural College of Missouri; he ranks high in his profession, and Missouri is proud of him.

The agricultural college of my State is making a special effort to extend its influence into the homes of the State and to have the elementary branches of agriculture taught in the common schools of the country, which, while it is meeting with success, I am constrained to say, is not being pressed with that zeal and prophetic spirit that the work and cause merit. The normal schools, secondary and primary schools are, however, becoming interested more and more every year in this character of education, and I should not neglect to say that the normal schools generally are giving a course in agricultural education.

The Missouri State Fruit Experiment Station, located at Mountain Grove, Mo., and supported entirely by the State, is devoted chiefly to the development of the fruit interest of the southern part of the State, which section is rapidly becoming one of the greatest fruit regions in the country.

Summer schools at Columbia, Mo., conducted annually for this purpose, are designed primarily for the purpose of training teachers in elementary agriculture.

The continued future development of the country, it is conceded, must in a large measure depend upon maintaining the fertility of the soil, the greatest storehouse of the country's wealth. Mines become exhausted, forests are cut away, but the soil remains and must be kept rich to assure the nation's growth, and if not, it will decline rather than climb to greater heights of power and prosperity. These facts are of magnificent importance, and yet the importance of agricultural education from another point of view is of immense value, that of training the minds of the children of to-day to be the depositories of the mental dynamics of the future, which are yet to lift the world to better things. It is rapidly becoming recognized as an educational tenet that the training of the hand and mind must go together, and agricultural work in this respect is found in the school garden, nature study, etc. Research work of this kind is equal, if not superior, to any other, and is exceedingly valuable to the general building up of the child, both mentally and physically.

PLEA FOR MORE PRACTICAL EDUCATION.

I believe that education should be more practical, and this need not reduce the cultural influence and benefits in the least. Nothing can be more enriching to the mind of a child or a man than to learn the secret of communing with nature in her many moods and manifestations. The flower, the beetle, the glowworm, the plant, the tree, the mountain, the river, and the starry heavens are all full of interest and suggestive of the most beautiful and useful thoughts, out of which have grown some of the finest passages in all literature.

Our common schools are rather extraordinary schools than otherwise. The children are given lessons in science, grammar, social economy, French, Latin, drawing, instrumental music, and so forth, often at the expense of learning English and how to spell and read well. They may know how to translate Latin, but not be able to render it into good English. This is farcical.

The need in common schools is thorough training in all the elementary English branches, in bookkeeping and business methods, in nature studies and object lessons.

Let the girls take, as part of their education in the higher branches, the lost science of cooking, housekeeping, and physiology. I am asking, first, for a safe foundation upon which to build a useful, as well as a beautiful, life, for people ought to be sensible, because most of them must earn their bread by work, and all of them ought to be compelled to do the very same thing—be employed in some useful occupation. To those who have means, with a love of learning, I commend a life of study, broad, deep, and thorough, well-rounded, if possible, by extensive travel and observation. We need great scholars; but the people need the industrial education that will make bread easier to win, and they need the time for meditation, the fruitage of nature study. For more than a century the people of America have been at work on the problem of rural reform. Some progress has been made, and we are now prepared for the complete accomplishment of what we have so earnestly sought, the placing of rural life upon a plane of profit, of culture, and power. We must commence at the bottom and readjust the life of the common people.

First, by increasing the earning capacity of the small farmers and by furnishing to them more comfortable homes, better schools, improved highways, telephones, free delivery of mails, and rural libraries. These improvements all require money. They can not be installed and maintained without it; hence, the basis of the better rural life is the greater earning capacity of the farmer. Farm renovation and the highest production are now fully understood, and they can be explained and illustrated in such a simple and practical way that it would be a crime not to send the gospel of maximum production to the farmer. Some persons say that the farmers are a hard class to reach and impress. That is not my experience. They are the most tractable of people if you have anything of value to offer—but they want proof. They do not take kindly to theories and they are quick to discriminate between the real farmer and the book farmer. Hence the message to the farmers must be practical and of easy application. Who shall bear this message? My experience is in favor of farmers of fair education and acknowledged success on the farm. They are liable to make mistakes, from a scientific standpoint, in delivering it, but these mistakes are easily corrected. The main thing is to get the farmer to act, and no one can do that as well as a fellow-farmer. The scientific man is sure to outdo the thing and the farmer is often disgusted and will not hear him even though he brings the truth. In general, it is not the man who knows the most who is the most successful, but the man who can convince his hearers that he has the truth to tell to them.

THE PROCESS OF TRANSFORMATION.

The process of changing the environment of a farmer is like that of transforming a farm boy into a scholar. First, the farmer may be selected to conduct a simple and inexpensive demonstration. Second, an understanding should be made with the United States Department of Agriculture or the State agricultural college, or both, by which he is to follow certain instructions. Third, he is to have better seed furnished to him by the United States Department of Agriculture. If he succeeds, his name is published in the papers. Fourth, each month, when the Government's field agent goes to examine his experimental farming, many of his neighbors likely will be present, and therefore he will unconsciously strive to improve his farm, so as to be ready for company, and will cultivate his crops better. Fifth, a report of his extra crop is made in the country papers. His neighbors talk about it and want to buy seed. Sixth, he sells the seed of his crop at a high price, and his neighbors inquire how it was all done, and he is invited to address farmers' meetings and institutes, and all at once he becomes a man of influence and a leader in new and better methods.

In not a great while a body of such men will grow up in a township, a county, a district, and finally a State is transformed. Before a change or a reform can take root and be of any value the environment of the people must be broken up and modified or but little permanent good in the way of reform can be expected. The environment of the farmer generally is limited to a few miles around. The experiment and demonstration required to prove the method sought to be established must therefore be carried to this limited area, and it must be shown how easy and simple it is to do valuable work, such as to restore the fertility of the soil, to multiply the products of the land per acre, to increase the number of acres each laborer can till, and show an increased yield of several fold, as well as an increased profit from untilled fields by stock feeding and animal husbandry. This is the farmers' cooperative demonstration work.

EDUCATION IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

I must insist that every State superintendent of schools and the deans of all agricultural colleges, including directors of experiment stations and all others interested, should persistently and unceasingly labor for a mature and up-to-date system of elementary education to be taught in all common schools, and especially in the rural schools of our country. This system is most admirably explained in Circular No. 60, by Dr. A. C. True, and which is issued by the Department of Agriculture. This circular, issued from the office of the Director of Experiment Stations, should be read by every wide-awake public school teacher and county superintendent in the land.

This laudable educational work can be best promoted through speeches and by printed letters and articles read before all kinds of farmers' meetings and institutes and agricultural boards, legislative committees and assemblies, and wherever an audience can be found that will hear.

The work certainly is attractive, and full to running over with new thoughts and new ideas which appeal to the imagination and are calculated to fire the mind with the zeal of a crusader on account of what can, beyond dispute, be accomplished by labor. Home, sweet home, with all of its charms and sad remindings floats through the mind with bewitching effect, but I must forego the poetry of my subject and adhere to the practical side.

WORK PROMOTED IN MISSOURI SCHOOLS.

Elementary agriculture is being taught in upward of 3,000 of the public schools in the State of Missouri, and the State's educators are generally alive to this great work and, I am certain, will press on and upward to the achievement of the noble work, philanthropic in a measure, that lies before them, for no more self-sacrificing, industrious, and poorly paid band of workers is to be found in the land than its school-teachers, who are almost always enthusiastic for the public good. I here ask to incorporate some letters from my district on this question:

PERRYVILLE PUBLIC SCHOOL,
Perryville, Mo., March 2, 1908.

DEAR MR. SMITH: I received your letter of inquiry to-day and take pleasure in answering at once.

This is my first year at Perryville, but I succeeded in getting agriculture introduced into the freshman year of the high school. We have a class of fourteen or fifteen and they are doing good work. All are very much interested. We have a regular text in the subject. In addition to the text we study the farmers' bulletins.

I am conducting a number of laboratory experiments with soils and seeds. For example, we take four different kinds of soil—clay, fine gravel, white sand, and humus—and test the capillarity of each, the water-holding capacity of each, and the amount of plant food in each, as shown by growing plants.

We test a number of different kinds of seeds for starch, proteids, and oil. We plant the seed in the spring and will carry on some more experiments in that line. We will do grafting and budding and spraying around over the town when the proper season comes for that. Also, we will take up the study of frost and its effects.

I have given the scholars a good start in the study of good stock and farm improvements. I expect to take up the home garden and flowers a little later.

Of course, we can not do the work as it is done where they are equipped for the work, but I assure you that what we do is appreciated and is valuable.

Along with this we have a United States weather observation station here, and that being a part of the Department of Agriculture makes the school work more interesting. I am quite sure that we will draw pupils from the country when our course is better understood. We have about seven country boys and girls in the class now.

Trusting that this information will be of assistance to you,

I remain, yours, very respectfully,

J. WILL PIERCE, Superintendent.

Hon. MADISON R. SMITH,
House of Representatives.

BONNETERRE, MO., March 17, 1908.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter, I will say that we are doing systematic agricultural work in our school here. We have no school garden and so the pupils do a large part of the work on garden plats at their homes. We have systematic class instruction in elementary agriculture.

The school furnishes the flower and vegetable seeds for the children's gardens, and at the opening of school in September a school fair is held at which prizes are offered for the best specimens of different flowers and vegetables raised by the children.

The work has been very successful in the past and is being heartily supported by the people of the community.

Yours, truly,

A. C. MAGILL,
Principal of High School.

Hon. M. R. SMITH,
House of Representatives.

I am in receipt of many other letters, some of which show that systematic work in agriculture is being carried on, but it is in the rural schools that less interest is shown in the matter, most likely because the schools are of short duration and because provisions are not made for carrying on the work. I must add, however, that the letters are all favorable to better agricultural education and clearly show that considerable interest has recently been awakened in the subject.

THE IMPORTANCE OF NATURE STUDY.

Dr. James Ralph Jewell, a very eminent authority on this subject, states that "nature study has already infused new life into our school system, and when made a study as to the relations of man to nature and its forces it produces that general educational result, viz, the proper response of the individual to his environment."

By nature study the child and the teacher are made companions and teach each other and commune with each other, and both commune with the attractions and mysteries of nature together.

To learn to look up to God through nature with reverential spirit is an educational asset more valuable than gold.

The educational, ethical, and economic value of nature study and culture none deny and all admit, and to those teachers who know what it means elucidation is unnecessary, and if any yet do not know, permit me to exhort them to put off sleep until they do know, for the task is not hard.

But this practical value is outweighed by the æsthetical value, its effect on the sentiments of the child. The mental beginning of a true love of nature is the crowning result of nature study, and the chastest sentiments are born within the pure heart of the child, on which the highest conceptions of religion rest, as out of which blossom its rarest flowers.

School gardens teach many other things, among them private care for public property, economy, honesty, application, concentration, justice, the true dignity of labor, and love for the beauties of nature.

"Nature study and school gardens serve better," says President Eliot, "to cultivate the critical discernment of beauty and excellence in nature and in human nature than any other agencies of education."

In conclusion, to build and finish the best character should be the aim of us all, and everyone should help every other with charity to attain this best of all objects. Money, worldly honor, and all that they bring are fleeting and pass away. Only the graces of charity, as St. Paul used it, can create a moral and spiritual organism that shall outlive the wrecks of time and never pass away.

For this highest work the man or the woman bred in the country, blessed with this kind of education, will sooner turn to the graces of charity for the consummation of the noblest of all the work that man can do—build an immortal character. [Applause.]

During the above,

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, as I am not able to make them in the time allotted to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKS] is recognized.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am one of the Members of this House who believe that the time during which we have under consideration a particular bill should not be devoted to general debate. Notwithstanding that, however, I desire to make a few remarks other than those upon the bill. Twice during this session one of my constituents who occupies a seat on the floor of this House has been fit to attack my distinguished constituent who lives at the other end of the Avenue. Four years ago I had the pleasure of running against my colleague. He was then an "also-ran" candidate, and I will be glad to have the pleasure of running against him again on such a platform as he has given us here from his speech in the House. Then, I think, he will be only a "said-to-have ran" candidate, if I am any judge of the temper of the district. His remarks, perhaps, call for no reply from me. I simply wish to say that he has an office in Wall street, and that counts for something.

I wish to apologize for his position. If I thought that what he said had any effect upon that distinguished neighbor of mine, or that anything said here detracted from anything that he has done, or from his record, or from his attitude, or from his standing before the people, I should speak upon it at greater length, but I believe that it availed nothing.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. COCKS of New York. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to know to whom the gentleman refers.

Mr. COCKS of New York. I am referring to a gentleman who is a constituent of mine and a resident of my district.

Mr. SULZER. Let us have his name.

Mr. COCKS of New York. He represents the Fourteenth District of New York.

Mr. SULZER. Tell us his name.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. WILLETT, I think, is his name. I regret the gentleman is not here. I do not propose to say anything against him. I simply wish to apologize for him; that is all. Perhaps he does not wish me to say that, but at the same time——

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKS] that his colleague [Mr. WILLETT] does not need the gentleman to apologize for him.

Mr. COCKS of New York. I expect that is right.

Now, as to the bill, I approach this subject from a little different attitude from most Members of the House. I am a farmer myself. I believe that this bill has taken good care of the interests of the farmer, notwithstanding the fact that we will doubtless hear from many on the floor of this House that the farmers are not receiving the recognition that they should have and are not having appropriated for their benefit a sufficient sum in comparison to the sums appropriated for the other Departments of the Government; but I, as a farmer, realize that this appropriation is for the purpose of helping a large class of our people that are engaged in a gainful occupation, and we can not justly compare that with the other Departments, because they look after the maintenance of our Government and its protection.

I believe we have gone very carefully over these items as embraced within this bill. We have provided for funds that are sufficient for the proper carrying on of the work in hand; and it is the desire of all, I believe, of those who really have the interests of the farmers, dairymen, and truck growers in this country at heart that this money spent by the Department of Agriculture shall be wisely spent, that some practical advantage shall arise from the expenditure. I do not feel, like some, desirous of obtaining vast appropriations just for the reason that we could say to our farmer constituents, "We have been able to induce the Congress of the United States to appropriate many millions of dollars for your advantage," but rather that we can show at the end of the year's work that we have added some knowledge that will be of advantage to the farmers of this country; that we have provided some helpful means whereby they may raise full crops, and that they may combat the enemies by which they are beset. We are desirous that this work shall be conducted along practical lines. We are not so much concerned as to the abstract, scientific value of certain propositions as we are regarding their agricultural economic value.

Therefore, if we have not in some instances made as large appropriations as some Members think necessary for certain lines of work, it is because your committee have been convinced that the appropriations that it has made are those best calculated to attain that end.

I had proposed to make some further remarks upon the bill in general, but the chairman of our committee and other members of our committee who have spoken have covered that subject so fully that I do not feel justified in taking the time of the House in saying anything further on that matter. I believe they have expressed my own views better than I could have expressed them, and, as I know, there are a number of gentlemen who desire to be heard on this bill, I therefore yield the balance of my time back to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LAMB. I ask that the gentleman from Mississippi be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have asked this concession of time in order to discuss some of the features of the pending bill, the particular matter to which I want to direct the attention of the House being the failure of the committee to make proper provision for carrying on the invaluable work of the Bureau of Soils. If the purpose of the committee can be fairly devined from the controversial spirit in which the Chief of that Bureau was cross-examined when he appeared before them, I believe the friends of the Bureau, those who sympathize with its great work and have faith in its possibilities for good, have cause for alarm. Not only did the committee refuse to appropriate what is needed to properly and effectively conduct the experiments of the Bureau and to give to it a relative increase with the other bureaus, but they have, on the contrary, reduced the appropriation from what it was in the last bill. During the past five years the appropriations for the other bureaus have been steadily and wisely increased, but this Bureau, which has such an important—such a vital function—to perform, has suffered an actual curtailment in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe this discrimination is unwise. I believe the work which this Bureau is doing is fraught with the greatest possibilities for good to the agricultural interests of this country. The purpose of the Department of Agriculture was declared in this language in the act creating it—

> That there is hereby established at the seat of government of the United States a Department of Agriculture, the general designs and duties of which shall be to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word.

What more useful information could be diffused among the people than that which will teach them how to develop and conserve the productive qualities of the soil? There are only three sources aside from the sea from which we draw our national wealth, according to the statistical abstract. These three are the soil, the forest, and the mine. The waste of the timber wealth of the country is a matter of common knowledge, and I believe I can truthfully say, of common scandal, in spite of the good advice and most strenuous efforts of the Bureau of Forestry of the Department of Agriculture. I am glad to note that this Bureau has been properly cared for in the bill.

I want to call your attention to one or two passages from a very interesting and instructive speech delivered by our most competent forester, Mr. Pinchot, before the American Forestry Association a few weeks ago.

This will show our appalling prodigality in the waste of one of our three sources of wealth, and emphasizes the necessity, if any emphasis be needed, of all the more jealousy in guarding the other two:

> Our timber, even at the present rate of consumption, so far as we can measure it, and giving every opportunity for covering mistakes by large estimates, is likely to last us between twenty and thirty years. And our timber is scarcely less necessary for us than our coal. Our forests, from which the timber comes, are vastly more necessary for us than our coal, for from the forests will ultimately come the one great source of power which is renewable and the only one of any great amount—that is, water power. And in our forests, through our water power, we shall find the great support of our future civilization. After a while, when coal is exhausted and oil and gas are gone, the only great source of power, so far as our knowledge of the physical universe now goes, will be water power, and the water power is absolutely and completely dependent upon the forests.

I will read another extract from that same speech, which while it does not refer to forestry, and is not therefore the opinion of an expert, is nevertheless the statement of a very high authority, a gentleman who has given a great deal of thought to the matter about which he speaks:

> There are two kinds of resources, renewable and nonrenewable resources. Resources which come out of the interior of the earth are nonrenewable. Those which come from the surface are most of them renewable. We have treated our mineral resources as if of those there was no end. Many of you here have seen natural gas pouring day and night out of great torches in the States of Indiana and Pennsylvania, from fields now exhausted. Many of you have seen iron mines in full swing where now they are gone; and the same is true of the coal. At our present rate of increase of consumption, our anthracite coal is good for only about 50 years, and our bituminous for only 100 years. That is, within a period of the nation's life which is equivalent to only a single decade in the life of an individual, the nation's supply of fuel, that most essential of all products for our present form of civilization, is likely to be exhausted.
> We have treated our soils in precisely the same way. The figures are familiar to most of you. I will simply say that a billion tons of the most fertile soil on the most fertile land of the United States goes annually into the ocean. It is the largest of all taxes paid by the farmer, and one of the largest losses that the nation suffers. Hundreds of square miles a year are made practically uninhabitable, or at least unsuitable for the support of a dense population. The surface of the soil is renewable; the coal, the iron, the oil, the gas, once gone, can never be renewed.

Three natural sources of wealth, Mr. Chairman—the forests, which our Forester says will be exhausted in twenty-five or thirty years; the mines, which will last from fifty to one hundred years longer, and which, unlike the other two sources, the soil and the forest, when once exhausted, can never be restored. And now the committee proposes to curtail the appropriation for the further extension of our efforts to reclaim and preserve the productivity of the soil, the last and the most vitally essential asset of every nation.

No stronger proof of the folly and wickedness of the Dingley law could be demanded than the story which the waste of our forest and mineral wealth tells. Under the false pretense of raising revenue we have fixed our tariff schedules so high that the mines and forests of the world have been cut off from our reach. We have by sheer force of law had our destructive energies focused upon our own natural resources, foolishly believing they were inexhaustible, and now we are just beginning to wake up to the fact that our patrimony has been squandered. The President has summoned the governors of all the States to meet with him and with the Congress on the 15th of May to take counsel together in the hope that some means may be devised to bring us to our senses. I hope he may see fit on that good day to direct attention to the fact that the Republican party has by some legislative legerdemain so fashioned our tariff law as to concentrate all of our unsurpassed genius for waste upon two of our three sources of wealth, and at the same time to produce too little revenue to enable us to properly reclaim and conserve the other one.

Mr. James J. Hill, who is not only a captain of industry, but who is one of the really great men of this generation, in a masterful address delivered before the Minnesota State Fair a year or two ago, made this ominous statement:

> It is certainly a moderate statement to say that by the middle of the present century, when our population shall have reached the 200,000,000 mark, our best and most convenient coals will have been so far consumed that the remainder can only be applied to present uses at an enhanced cost which would probably compel entire rearrangement of industries and revolutionize the common lot and common life. This is not a mere possibility but a probability which our country must face.

The waste of our other great mineral product—iron—has kept pace with our prodigality in our coal production.

I will read one other statement from Mr. Hill's great speech:

> There is within reach, possibly, 1,500,000,000 tons of merchantable iron ore in the deposits of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan. This will keep our industry going, supposing consumption to remain stationary, for thirty or forty years. In the year 1950, as far as our own resources are concerned, we will approach an ironless age. For a population of 200,000,000 people our own supply of iron will have retreated almost to the company of the precious metals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are not alone to legislate for the United States of 1908 or for our present generation, but we, as statesmen, must look to the future. We have no right to waste the magnificent estate that has come down in trust to us from our fathers, but we should so conserve it, we should so manage the affairs of this great Government as to hand over this splendid patrimony to our children unimpaired.

In addition to the natural increase in our population, we have marching toward our shores an army of a million immigrants a year. It is a matter of speculation, of course, what the population of this country will be in any given year in the future, but a number of statisticians have indulged somewhat in prophecy along these lines, and they all agree that by the year 1950 our population will have reached 200,000,000. Some of them far exceed that tremendous figure. I have seen the statement in the press—I do not know how true it is and therefore will not vouch for its accuracy—purporting to have come from the Speaker of this House, in which he says that he can remember when the population of the United States was 18,000,000, and that in his opinion within the lifetime of men now living it will attain to the tremendous total of 400,000,000. Now, these are immense figures, Mr. Chairman, and they show a situation that is well worthy of our thought.

We have taxed ourselves as few people have ever voluntarily done to foster and encourage the manufacturing industries of the country. Recognizing that in some instances a monopoly is justifiable and advisable, we have passed patent laws in order to encourage inventors and inventions, so that when a man comes with a useful invention, with a device or an idea that is likely to lighten the burdens of men and bring more happiness to more homes, we give him letters patent in order that he may have a monopoly of the sale of the particular scheme or device, and so impose an additional tax upon the people by way of an increased selling price.

Suppose another wizard like Edison should rise up with some scheme or some device whereby he could double the value of our manufactures, or by a discovery of some process of mining he could increase the value of the product of our mines a billion dollars annually. Why, the people would rise up and call his name blessed.

The total value of our agricultural products last year exceeded $6,000,000,000. Suppose, by some new process or discovery in the Department of Agriculture, a new means of soil reclamation, or soil conservation, or some new adaptation of soil treatment to plant life should be discovered by which the new lands of America can be made to produce as much per acre as the old lands of the Old World. The result would be an addition to our national wealth of not a billion dollars, but $6,000,000,000, and the base of our industrial fabric so be broadened and strengthened against the siege of hard times and the storm of panic which must sooner or later come to all people. [Applause.]

Is it unreasonable to look for any such discovery? This Bureau has already made some remarkable discoveries. And I do not believe it is unreasonable to expect very much more from it in the future. This is a new country, Mr. Chairman. It is not far beyond the memory of our old men to recall the war whoop of the painted savage, yet it is not uncommon even in the new and fertile valleys of the Mississippi River to hear men speak of fields that are worn out. This is a shame upon ourselves and a sin against posterity. The very fields that were under cultivation when old Canute bade the restless ocean to recede are to-day, after all the centuries of cultivation, yielding more per acre than ever before in the history of England.

We produced in this country last year, according to the statistical abstract, an average of 15¼ bushels of wheat to the acre. In England, where the land has been under cultivation for thousands of years, the average yield of wheat land was 33 bushels per acre. In Ireland the average was 37 bushels per acre, in Germany 28 bushels per acre. In all of the countries of the world where the lands have been in cultivation for thousands of years they are producing more than we are to-day.

The Bureau of Soils is doing a great work. There are 400 applications now on file with the Secretary asking for these investigations for soils about the country. Under the appropriation which this bill makes only 59 of the 400 applications can be granted. Now, these applications come from all over the country, from the East and from the West; from every geographical division of the country surveys are asked for in increasing numbers.

It is most natural that the farmers of this country, the people who are interested, and that means all of us, in conserving the productive qualities of our soil should be anxious to have these surveys made. They are anxious that every scientific fact that is possible to be developed and ascertained by experts in the Department should be made known in the hope that we may reclaim what are now becoming worn-out soils.

In the division of States in the North Atlantic group—Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, New Hampshire, and Maine—from 1890 to 1900, as shown by the census figures, the value of farm lands decreased nearly one-quarter of a billion dollars. From all sections of the country applications are piling in upon the Department asking to have these soil surveys made. They are coming from every section of the country asking the same thing.

In the South Atlantic States 103 are asked for; only 14 can be made. In the North Central States 85 are asked for and only 12 can be made. In the South Central division 134 are asked for and only 17 can be made. In the Western division 50 are asked for and only 8 can be made.

An instance of the success attending an intelligent interest on the part of the Government in the study and development of new and scientific methods of soil preservation is furnished in France. The very fields that were in cultivation when all Gaul was divided into three parts twenty centuries ago are to-day the veritable garden spot of the world, and the soil that furnished sustenance for Cæsar's legions then is keeping France in the very forefront of all the nations of the earth to-day.

Wheat lands in Minnesota in 1900, and Minnesota was above the average, produced 14.5 bushels per acre. In the beautiful valley of the Loire in France, which has been in cultivation ever since the wit of man was able to fashion a plow, the yield was 33 bushels per acre.

The fact that our soil is losing its productive qualities is not unique in the history of the world. This condition obtained in England more than a hundred years ago. Her statesmen, appreciating the fact that something would have to be done, established a bureau similar to this in the office of the home secretary, and scientific agriculturists went out through the country to make examination into the condition of the soils and the relation of the soil to plant life, and, in other words, did the things that are being done in our Bureau. No effort was ever more fruitful of happier results. The results were magical. The yield per acre was increased steadily and has yearly resulted in increased crops and increased land rents and increased land values.

In Germany exactly the same result followed, and these governments are to-day having translated into German and French and into other foreign languages the reports that our Bureau of Soils is issuing. They are making investigations along similar lines and making use of the information that comes from our investigations.

Yet the Committee on Agriculture here, instead of increasing the appropriation so as to meet the increasing demands of the people, has in this bill actually curtailed the amount appropriated for these surveys. The Chief of that Bureau told the committee in a most interesting statement that it costs more now, and he gives the reasons for it, to do a given amount of work than it did ten years ago, so that $200,000 appropriated to-day, or rather $80,000 to meet this particular work, will do less than $80,000 ten years ago. It will take, according to the estimates of the Chief of the Bureau, $200,000 to conduct experiments along the lines that the necessities of the situation require, $200,000 a year—a mere bagatelle. Yet the committee appropriates for that purpose $80,000.

According to his estimate, if $200,000 a year were appropriated it would take twenty years to do the work. Now, can we afford, for the sake of saving $120,000 a year, to take the chances on this matter? In addition to this, the Chief of the Bureau asks an appropriation in order to have what he calls "soil utilization work"—that is, men to follow in the wake of those who make the surveys to give practical and actual demonstrations to the farmers where the surveys are made, and thus show the advantage that will accrue from this particular work. They have done that in a number of places. It is through the instrumentality of the Bureau of Soils and this utilization work that the alkali lands of the West have been reclaimed, in California, at Fresno; at Yakima, in Washington, and in Utah and in a number of States. First, they made the survey of the soil and ascertained the conditions there, and then put the utilization men in and demonstrated that the alkali could be leached from those alkali plains and the land reclaimed to agriculture.

That has been demonstrated. Alfalfa, which is the most difficult of nearly all plant life to maintain in that character of soil, is to-day being grown successfully on these alkali lands in the West as a result, first, of the soil survey, and then of the demonstration by the utilization men of that Bureau. They have gone into the East first with their surveys and declared that those soils would produce a certain variety of tobacco valuable as cigar wrappers, a very high quality of tobacco. They did that in New England and they made some investigations in Texas. The Chief of the Bureau endeavored to persuade the Secretary of Agriculture to make a demonstration, to plant and see if his theory was correct. He would not do it. It was not the Secretary's judgment. It was not Doctor Galloway's judgment, he tells us. It was nobody's opinion but his own, but he finally persuaded the Secretary to allow him to make the experiment. He did it, and it proved successful in Connecticut, in Alabama, and in Texas, as a result, please bear in mind, of this demonstration made by these utilization men.

Now, for that work he asks an increase in the appropriations heretofore made. It is insisted that this is not a matter properly for his Bureau. I do not believe that is a good answer. It is purely a matter of administration. The money ought to be appropriated for the work, and I can not conceive how a bureau that is not directly interested in demonstrating the correctness of the theory of the survey can do the demonstration work more effectively or will more surely get results than the bureau itself which has made the survey and has advanced the theory. I have no quarrel, of course, with the Bureau of Plant Industry. I do not think that any bureau in any Department is doing greater good than it is. I am taking no sides whatever in bureau politics. It is immaterial to me by which bureau the work is done, if only it is done. But I submit it ought to be done and the appropriation made in this bill is not sufficient to do it properly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman define what he means by "utilization men?"

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Utilization men are defined in the language of the Chief of the Bureau and if the gentleman will permit me, in answer to that question, I will print his statement on that. That will enlighten the House. Of course, the gentleman himself knows what the Department wants with these utilization men and what they mean by it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all. I do not understand what a utilization man is.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. A utilization man, roughly speaking, is a man who follows in the wake of the man who makes the actual soil survey. For instance, they send a man down in Texas and he makes a soil survey. He finds out those qualities, those elements present in the soil that in his opinion will render that soil suitable for the culture and production of a certain variety of tobacco. That is simply his theory. Of course we can not always make the facts square with our theories, so the chief sends along a utilization man, and he goes down there and makes the actual test. He gets some farmer to go in with him or perhaps to give him a small plat of land for that purpose. He makes a crop of tobacco on it under certain cultural methods that commend themselves to his judgment, and so demonstrates either the correctness or incorrectness of his theory. This was the procedure in the alkali lands of the Far West. For instance, they went out in the State of my friend from Washington and there made a soil survey.

They ascertained the presence of these alkaline salts to a certain depth in the ground, and they believed that subjecting the soils to certain treatment would render them fertile and productive. They thereupon sent a utilization man to demonstrate the correctness of their theory and——

Mr. MURDOCK. The utilization man came from the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That utilization man did. Now, the idea of the committee, as I undersand it, is to turn that demonstration work over to the Bureau of Plant Industry and let them develop it. The point about it is this——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me? Is that Bureau of Plant Industry also under the supervision of the chief of the Agriculture Department, Secretary Wilson?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; and Doctor Whitney is Chief of the Bureau of Soils and Doctor Galloway is Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry.

Mr. HARDY. So your position is it does not make any difference who does it so there is provision made to do it?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But there are $80,000 only appropriated to make soil surveys. That is work that must be done of course by the Bureau of Soils. Only $80,000 is appropriated for that purpose when in the opinion of the Chief there should be $200,000, and if $200,000 a year is appropriated it will still take twenty years to complete the survey of the farm lands which in his opinion ought to be surveyed.

Mr. COCKS of New York rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes, I submit.

Mr. COCKS of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it wise to have utilization men from two different bureaus traveling over the country on practically the same errand?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will answer that, though not as an expert. I have read what appears in the hearings on this subject, and I have been enlightened in private conversations by my friend from New York and by the chairman of the committee, and I am free to confess that I do not catch the full force of the argument that this is a duplication of work. Now, if the Bureau of Soils should send a man out to investigate alkali soils, for instance, and the Bureau of Soils did do it——

Mr. COCKS of New York rose.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I have not finished yet—and the Bureau of Plant Industry should send a man out to investigate that same thing right there in that same neighborhood under the same climatic conditions, under the same atmospheric conditions, and soil conditions, that would be a duplication, but if this bureau was investigating the conditions of the alkali soils in Washington and another man from the Bureau of Plant Industry should go to Kansas and make an experimental test there to raise this, that, or the other vegetable product on certain soils there, that would not be a duplication of work.

The men would have been sent out from two different bureaus, and reports would have been sent in to two different chiefs, but they would all be printed at last by the Department of Agriculture, and the people would obtain the benefit from them, so it occurs to me that it is a mere technicality to say that it is a duplication of work. The Bureau of Plant Industry is a great bureau, and it is certainly doing a great work well; but the Bureau of Plant Industry and the Bureau of Animal Industry and the Bureau of Soils must all lap over onto the work of some other bureau now and then. For instance, the Bureau of Plant Industry is making investigation to ascertain the effect of poisonous plants on animal life and how to eradicate them; plants that grow in the different parts of the country, in the pasture, in the pond, in the field. Cattle and stock generally grazing there drink the water and die, and people do not know what is the trouble.

Now, this Bureau makes an investigation to see if it is not due to the existence of certain plant life there, and they examine the animals, they make post-mortem examinations, and the Bureau of Plant Industry, mind you, is doing this, and properly doing it. That, of course, is overlapping to that extent the work of the Bureau of Animal Industry, but it is a very proper and necessary encroachment and should not be called "duplication." The Bureau of Soils may sometimes overlap the Bureau of Plant Industry, when they have ascertained by a survey that a given soil exists, and knowing the relation it bears to plant life make a demonstration crop to ascertain if this soil will produce the plant indicated. Now, it may be that in that particular way they are overlapping, to some extent, the work of the Bureau of Plant Industry, but it is not a duplication.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Will the gentleman yield? After all, as to the growing of the plant on that land after the soil survey, is not that a demonstration as to what particular plant will grow there——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes. I stated just now there may be some overlapping, but here the committee fails to appropriate but $80,000 a year to make the soil surveys.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me return to the thread of my argument, which has been somewhat broken by these interruptions. I want to call your attention more particularly to the experience of France. I think we could not do better than to emulate her example in many ways.

France is perhaps the best illustration of the wisdom of state aid in the reclamation of exhausted soils as well as in the development of up-to-date transportation facilities. The Government has not only aided the farmers in reclaiming and restoring exhausted soils, but it has the best system of waterways and public roads of any other government. What of it, you ask? Well, forty years after she had been beaten prostrate in the terrible war with Germany, when the Iron Chancellor, intending to strike her a blow that would make her a cripple for life, compelled her to pay an indemnity of a billion dollars, she is the most prosperous country in the world.

All the world stood aghast at what they believed was the fall of that great nation when this fine was imposed, but before they could realize what was happening she had not only paid off the tremendous sum, but she had spent almost an equal amount on internal improvements, and to-day she holds fifteen billions of interest-bearing securities of the other nations.

Political changes came in kaleidoscopic succession in the last century, but France is a nation of farmers. She has builded her house upon a rock, and the sun of her prosperity could not be long obscured by the clouds of political strife and war. Among the very first nations of this turbulent earth, first in all the elements that go to make a people great is Germany. There are 60,000,000 people in that great Empire, which embraces an area of 200,000 square miles—a little smaller than Texas. No people ever learned the lesson which we are trying now to teach better than the Germans did. Her progress in the past half century has been tremendous. She has gone out upon the open seas with her wares, and wherever shops are kept and the articles which civilized man requires for his comfort are offered for sale you will find the meaningful legend stamped in letters of light "Made in Germany."

While this is true, Mr. Chairman, the glory of Germany, the rock on which she has builded, is her agriculture. While her manufactures have gone forward by leaps and bounds, her growth has been symmetrical. She has not only increased her acreage, but by the application of scientific methods in soil reclamation and development the yield per acre in all cereals has been materially increased. The increase in yield in wheat in the past thirty years has been 20 per cent, and all other crops in proportion. As stated before, in 1906 our average yield of wheat was 15.5 bushels; the yield in Germany for that same year was 28.55 bushels. Our average yield of oats was 31.2 and her average yield of oats was 43.65. With what shame should we of this country hear of worn-out lands when we see the fields that were ripe with abundant harvests when Arminius destroyed the power of all-conquering Rome yielding more per acre to-day than ever before.

Now, Mr. Chairman, are we, in order to save the paltry sum of $120,000, to shut off the investigation by this Bureau which may result—I do not say will result; we can not prophesy with absolute assurance—but which may, and we hope will result in the discovery of some methods of soil preservation and reclamation that will enable us to produce as much per acre as our neighbors across the sea? I think that is a serious question, one that is entitled to the attention of this committee. Take the great valley of the Red River of the North. It is contended by many statisticians that it is yielding less per acre as the years go on. What are we to do about it? The average yield per acre in Minnesota in 1890 was 15.5 bushels, and in 1900 it was 14.5 bushels, a loss of 1 bushel per acre on more than six and a half million acres. The average yield per acre in the two Dakotas has been decreasing for the past few years.

Here is the yield for the past three years:

Year.	Average production per acre (bushels).
1905	14.0	13.7

What about the Dingley tariff? Will not that "do the business?" We have imposed a tariff tax of 15 cents a gallon on the products of petroleum. Does that raise no revenue? Is this levied simply to keep out competition and thereby turn our farmers over to the tender mercies of the Standard Oil? What about the tariff on the products of the steel trust? Does it yield no revenue to Uncle Sam? We know it enables the steel trust to rob our farmers by charging them more for their agricultural implements, barbed wire, wire nails, and all the other products of steel than they charge the farmers of Australasia for the identical articles after transporting them 10,000 miles across the seas. Can not this fiscal heir of all the ages which enables the steel trust to pay one of its officials annually more in salary than we allow the Bureau of Soils in ten years; can not it, I say, scrape up enough revenue to enable us to continue the good work of this Bureau and so advise our farmers how to preserve the productivity of the soil to the end that he may produce enough on his acres to at least pay the tariff tax?

If the Dingley law has lost its charm, if it can no longer with success call spirits from the vasty deep, and if it, being earthly (as we on this side of the Chamber have always suspected), has gone the way of the earth, and yet having been worshiped so long has become too sacred to be profaned by the hand of the revisionists, then let us resort to another method of raising revenue—one that puts the tax on while the man who pays it looks and understands that he is paying it. Let us levy a tax upon the vices of men and not upon their virtues. Let the tax gatherer visit the saloon and the gambling house rather than the altar and the hearthstone. Five cents additional tax on every deck of cards would produce nearly three times over the revenue required to continue this Bureau in an effective way. Twenty-five cents more on every barrel of beer would more than pay the total cost of administering the entire Department of Agriculture. We on this side of the Chamber are helpless to do more than suggest, but if I had not learned better by long experience I would at least indulge the hope that this suggestion might commend itself to the "party of great moral ideas." [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield fourteen minutes of the time granted to me to the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT].

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, we have before us for consideration the agricultural appropriation bill. It has not been so many years since the Department of Agriculture was established, yet it is conceded by all that this was a good business proposition and has been of untold benefit to the nation and a great factor in the marvelous development of our agricultural resources, and that the money expended for its support was money that has been spent for a good purpose and has been repaid many times in the betterment and increased production of our agricultural products.

In this connection I desire to call your attention briefly to another of our great fundamental industries. I have listened to numerous fine addresses from the many talented gentlemen in this House since Congress convened, discussing the question of finance. I am going to take only a few minutes of your time, and I am not going to talk to you about greenbacks, for in California we use gold for money, with a little silver thrown in to make change.

During the past few months I have received, as no doubt many of you have, a wagonload of fine documents bearing on the question of banking and currency, all written by people who ought to know or think they know something about finance, and who have taken the subject up from almost every imaginable point of view. They all agree that the present financial column supporting the business interests of the United States is weak, and that it is impossible to take this column down and erect an entire new one.

You all agree that this financial column needs attention, but you do not all agree how it should be fixed, where it should be repaired, and what materials should be used.

Now, I propose that good judgment will warrant you in making a few repairs right at the base of the column, on its foundation. This is a material that can be used to advantage at any time in the foundation of your financial column—a real $20 gold piece.

Gold, the product of our mills and sluices, is a legal tender in itself, a commodity that requires no drumming to sell, a standard of value never depreciating, a bright and rich reward for human industry.

While I have heard and read a great deal on the subject of finance, I have heard no man claim that his proposition on the financial question would do more than afford some relief, in a greater or less degree, and provide for cases of emergency. So that I consider it proper to suggest anything that can be done on practical, not theoretical lines, to afford some relief, not only in emergencies but all the time.

Now, while barrels of ink and thousands of tons of paper are being used and silver-tongued orators are explaining all the various intricacies of the currency question, I want to call your attention to the fact that right now, at the present time, while I am talking to you, the miners of the West are doing their duty, delving into the ground, working by day and by night, taking from Mother Earth this precious metal—gold; adding to the wealth of this nation, bracing up its financial condition, producing millions of dollars monthly, not in bank notes, not in greenbacks, but in pure gold, giving practical, not theoretical, but positive relief to your national finances.

Prior to the year 1848 the production of gold in the United States was practically nothing, when news came from far-off California, the then unknown country in the West, that James W. Marshall, working in the sluice at Sutter's mill, near Coloma, had discovered gold. Immediately there was a rush, and thousands of young men left their homes in the East to make their fortunes in the Golden State, which has turned out to be not only a Golden State, but also a perfect Garden of Eden.

You know the result of this discovery and that the amount of gold since produced gave the business interests of the United States a stimulus which they have felt and are feeling to this day, and which proved itself to be one of the strong factors in the rapid development of our country to its present greatness; and you should know that the gold produced by the hydraulic miners of California helped the credit of this nation during the civil war.

Following the discovery of gold in California was the opening of gold mines in other Western States, so that the production of gold in the United States, practically nothing in the year 1848, reached, in the year 1906, more than $94,000,000 ($94,373,800), and in 1907 to about the same, but probably a little less.

This is what I call a positive addition to the money of the United States; and when you consider the stimulus given to your business interests by the circulation of this amount of money, I believe that not one of you will deny this industry the consideration it certainly deserves at your hands. My proposition is that you do something to increase the mineral production of the United States; add, if you can, to your finances another $100,000,000 annually in hard cash by increasing the production of gold.

In the West and in some of the Southern States, buried in the ground, some near the surface, yet much more buried deeper in the earth, is stored an inexhaustible quantity of this precious metal. And there are deposits sufficiently large for hundreds of millions of dollars to be taken out annually for centuries to come. And there are inexhaustible and unknown deposits of the other metals and minerals that are worthy of more attention than they are now receiving.

All that is necessary to secure them is good practical mining, and the Government can assist the practical miner in all branches of the mining industry in many ways by having men of science take up the subject and study the weak points of the industry, with the view of making mining safer, so as to stop the great loss of life such as has recently occurred amongst the coal miners and which occurs in all kinds of mining, give us more and better mining schools, furnish information that will lead to the opening of new mines, the working to greater depths and increased production of the present ones, and such knowledge as will permit of the operation of mines that can not be worked to-day at a profit, and also protect the people from fraudulent mining schemes, furnish information about new mining districts and information regarding the working and reduction of ores. It can do many things for the industry and give a helping hand in many ways to the elimination of those difficulties encountered in the past. I will not go into details on this subject now, but will call your attention to but one illustration, to one branch of the industry in one place—that of hydraulic mining in the State of California—which for lack of proper Government aid has been throttled for the past thirty years and the nation thereby deprived of $300,000,000 in gold.

During the past twenty years numerous public conventions have repeatedly passed resolutions and petitioned Congress for the establishment of a department of mines, with a Cabinet officer at its head, in order that the mining industry of the United States, which last year had a product valued at $2,000,000,000, might receive the fostering care of this Government. The result of this concerted action has so far attracted attention that the President in his annual message at the convening of this Congress said:

> A bureau of mines should be created under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Interior; the bureau to have power to collect statistics and make investigations in all matters pertaining to mining and particularly to the dangers of the industry. If this can not now be done, at least additional apropriations should be given the Interior Department to be used for the study of mining conditions, for the prevention of fraudulent mining schemes, for carrying on the work of mapping the mining districts, for studying methods of minimizing the accidents and dangers in the industry; in short, to aid in all proper ways the development of the mining industry.

We know it is useless to talk about a department of mines, but you can give us a bureau of mines. The gold industry alone warrants this action on your part, not considering the vast interests of the other branches of mineral production. For if gold mining be properly fostered by the Government, its production can be doubled, and a bureau of mines can do this.

But in considering mineral production gold is not first in the great mining industry; coal takes the lead, and it is needless for me to enlarge on the vast importance of coal mining. Iron and steel we must have, and anything that is done in their interest affects every industry in the nation, and I may call to your attention that recently in Shasta County, in northern California, iron ores have been successfully worked by electric process.

This is sometimes called the electric age, but this age is still in its infancy; and while we have a large copper production, the demand for copper must continue to increase as the use of electricity increases. And while there has been a flurry in prices of copper and copper-mining stocks, this branch of mineral production is so important and so connected with all manufacturing industries that it is entitled to the utmost consideration by the Government, so that the home production of copper will meet all requirements of the future.

I will not mention other mineral products, but have here a table giving the mineral production for the year 1906 in the United States:

This is a remarkable showing of mineral production, yet the only recognition this great industry is receiving at the hands of the Government to-day is a few small divisions in the Geological Survey in the Interior Department. An annual mineral product in the United States of $2,000,000,000 certainly deserves consideration at your hand equally with the other industries of the country. Increase their production, and you increase the prosperity of this nation; increase the prosperity of the nation, and your finances will take care of themselves.

In the past year we have been horrified by the many frightful accidents in our great coal mines. Disaster has followed disaster until there is a general demand that the United States Government do something that will tend to decrease this untold fatality in our mines.

FATAL ACCIDENTS IN THE UNITED STATES.

In the coal mines of the United States in 1906, 6,861 men were killed or injured, the number killed being 2,061 and the number injured being 4,800.

The number of men killed in the coal mines of the United States for each year from 1890 is shown in the following table:

Number of men killed in the coal mines of the United States, 1890–1906.

1892	859	1902	1,828
1893	965	1903	1,794
1894	957	1904	1,999
1895	1,057	1905	2,097
1896	1,120	1906	2,061
1897	947
1898	1,049	Total	22,840
1899	1,243

The total number of men killed since 1889, as shown above, is 22,840. It will be noted that as many violent deaths have occurred in the coal mines of the United States during the last six years as during the preceding eleven years, the number of fatal accidents having practically doubled within that time.

The loss of life is simply enormous, and it is time that this Government did something that should lead to relief. And I trust that the Committee on Mines and Mining, of which I am a member, will be able to report a bill that will receive your favorable consideration. This committee is hard at work on the subject and fully realizes that investigations should be made by the Government that will give results and help to stop this awful slaughter. The coal-mine operators and the miners both admit that they do not understand properly the subject and disagree amongst themselves as to many of the points involved. I recently visited one of the great coal mines in Pennsylvania, and, though making only a hurried trip, could see ample room for men of science to expend their energies and talents in proper scientific investigation of this subject and the investigation of other subjects connected with the great coal-mining industry.

There has been in the past few years a great deal of attention given to the subject of the destruction of our great forests, and one of the important divisions of the Agricultural Department is that of Forestry. It has been stated to me that 40 per cent of the coal in the coal fields in some way or other is wasted, varying in different localities. If it is important to look out for our forests, which can be renewed, is it not equally important to look out for our supply of coal, which can not be replaced? So that, in considering the proposition of a mining bureau, you can do much for the great coal-mining industry.

The same propositions hold good for all the other branches of mineral production, and I ask you to give the proposition of a mining bureau careful consideration and do something for the mining interests, the same as you are doing for the agricultural interests, and you will assist in doing something on practical lines that will help to make that solid foundation for your financial system which it requires, so that it will stand firm and secure in all storms, in all emergencies, and for all time. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

During the above,

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, here are several tables showing the gold and mineral productions in the United States, and also accidents in coal mines, which I would like to have printed in connection with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Also during the above,

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to continue my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, if my friends across the aisle who seem to be so interested in knowing what "soil utilization" means, will come over here, I can show them what it is.

Several MEMBERS. Come over here.

Mr. GRIGGS. You are afraid to come over here. I knew you folks were getting scared, but I did not know that you were so badly frightened. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The line between soil survey and soil utilization, on the one side, and plant industry on the other is a very shadowy one, though they are wide enough apart and entirely distinct in the beginning. The duty of the soil survey, first, is to survey the soils and make maps of the districts and areas so surveyed, ascertaining the character of the soils. That is one branch of the soil survey. Another, and this brings it down to the very shadowy line between soil utilization and plant industry, to which I have just referred.

After ascertaining the character of the soil and drawing the map comes the investigation in the laboratories of the Bureau, both as to the physical and chemical properties of these soils, and in that connection the study of any particular problems of soil fertility, soil fertilization, and soil management, which may be found necessary in order to furnish a scientific basis for the improvement of the crop-producing power of those soils. When necessary a broader field of study comes up for the adaptation of the various types of soil to the particular varieties of plants to be grown best on that soil. The adaptation of cotton, or corn, or other plants particularly as known in my district, such as the tobacco investigations, demonstrate the need of the utilization division of the Soil Bureau. The Soil Utilization Bureau and that of Plant Industry ought to work hand in hand.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Georgia knows, does he not, that for the most part, with the exception perhaps of one or two small areas, all this utilization work in the tobacco culture to which he refers has been turned over to the Bureau of Plant Industry?

Mr. GRIGGS. I understand that perfectly well, but not all of the Soil Utilization Bureau, because:

The Bureau of Plant Industry intends to improve the tobacco industry by conducting experiments in breeding and fertilization, but they do not propose to help or assist the farmer in the practical methods pertaining to the growing of this highly specialized crop.

Now, that represents the difference as clearly as it can be stated.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is it not a fact that the Bureau of Plant Industry declined to make the experiment in the tobacco culture that the gentleman from Georgia refers to, and that that was made then by the Bureau of Soils against the advice, or rather contrary to the opinion of the Bureau of Plant Industry?

Mr. GRIGGS. I can not answer that question.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is so stated by the Chief of the Bureau of Soils in the hearings.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would say that I would like very much to answer that question, but I do not want to occupy the time of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GRIGGS. I am much obliged to my friend from Kansas. On account of the very crowded condition of business in the House right lately, following an alleged agreement between the President and certain gentlemen unnamed to do certain things, to which they had to be driven, before this Congress adjourned, I can not under Republican practice, procedure, and rules here take up any more time than I am taking. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The development of the tobacco industry in Florida was started in about 1887 with the production of a small acreage in the immediate vicinity of Quincy, Fla. It was found that the soils and climate of this region were particularly fitted for the production of a high grade wrapper and filler tobacco. The production of tobacco spread slowly and was confined to a single Florida county until 1899, when the Bureau of Soils of the Department of Agriculture undertook soil surveys and the study of the tobacco soils of the United States. The first soil survey made in Florida was one of Gadsden County. This was undertaken to determine the character of the different types of soil upon which the best tobacco was raised and the greatest profits secured. It was found that the wrapper leaf tobacco could be produced only upon a certain definite soil type in its perfection, and the extent and area of this soil was mapped in Gadsden County. It was also found that the filler tobacco was produced on totally different soils, which would not raise the more valuable wrapper tobacco.

Since this first survey additional soil surveys have been made of the nearby counties of Leon and Jefferson, in Florida, and of the Bainbridge area, comprising the southern portion of Decatur County, Ga. The soil survey of Gadsden County comprises 350,000 acres of land. Nine different types of soil were found, only two of which are particularly fitted to tobacco culture. In the Leon County area 432,000 acres were surveyed and twelve different types of soil were found, of which again but two were suited to tobacco culture. The total area of Jefferson County amounted to 370,000 acres, with fifteen different types of soil, only two of which were suited to the production of high-grade tobacco. The Bainbridge area covered 233,000 acres, embracing nine different types of soil, one of which was well suited to the filler tobacco and another was suited for the production of the highest grade cigar wrapper.

On the basis of these soil surveys extensive purchases of land have been made, both by local and outside parties who desired to engage in tobacco culture, and in many instances land which was previously valued at from $5 to $10 an acre has increased in value, because it has been shown to be suited to tobacco culture, to upward of $100 per acre. Not only has this great increase of land values followed the completion of soil surveys, but the tobacco industry has spread from its original restricted locality, near Gadsden, through three Florida counties and into three counties in Georgia—Decatur, Grady, and Thomas. It is a well-known fact that at the present time outside firms desiring to engage in tobacco culture are awaiting the completion and publication of the soil surveys of Thomas and Grady counties, Ga., in order that they may purchase land in the full light of all the knowledge thrown upon the character of these tobacco soils by these reports.

In individual instances in Decatur County plantations which before the survey was made were held at a nominal value of, say, $2,000 to $5,000, have been sold to tobacco growers at a price of $50,000 to $60,000, and this price was paid solely because the soil survey showed that the land upon the plantation in question was suited to the production of these special crops.

The representatives of the soil survey have assured the people of my district that there are large areas of soil within these southwestern counties upon which the filler tobacco may be grown to advantage. They also assure me that there are much smaller areas, especially near the Florida line, where the soils are well suited to the production of the shade-grown wrapper tobacco. Already residents of this district are attempting to grow the shade-grown wrapper upon lands which they think well suited to its production. The production of this tobacco involves an expenditure of not less than $1,000 per acre before the first crop can be grown. The opinion of the soil expert in regard to the quality of these lands is absolutely necessary before these gentlemen can feel safe in investing their money upon such an extensive scale in a new enterprise which is being developed within the district. Whatever is true of this section is true of all others.

In the beginning of such an important industry it is not only necessary that the services of the soil expert should be secured for the proper selection of the land, but the cultivation and fertilization of this land for tobacco production differs so materially from the ordinary cultivation and fertilization demanded by cotton, corn, and sugar cane—the common crops of the district—that the services of an expert in soil management are needed during the inception of tobacco culture to advise directly with the growers who are starting this new line of work.

This one crop, tobacco, pays into the United States Treasury annually, from the internal revenues of the taxes imposed, a sum four times as great as is appropriated for all the investigation work of the Department of Agriculture, and it would seem that some portion of this money might well be spent in the extension of an agricultural industry which pays so largely and so directly the expenses of the maintenance of the Government.

Another great study which promises to add millions of dollars to the annual producing capacity of American farmers is that of a detailed study of the adaptation of the more than 400 different types of soil existing in this country to the particular varieties of staple crops which may best be grown upon them. It is the common experience of every practical cotton planter that only a few of the nearly 200 different varieties of cotton may be grown to advantage on the soils which are found upon his plantation. In one instance which has come to my personal knowledge a skilled cotton planter secured seed of an improved variety of cotton, which he planted upon his plantation. Now it happened that he had three distinct varieties of cotton soil upon this plantation, and within the bottom lands this variety of cotton grew to a great height and produced few, if any, productive cotton bolls. Upon the gentle slopes which bordered this cotton land the cotton found a situation similar to that upon which it had been developed through many years and produced a splendid crop of first-class upland cotton, while upon the eroded hillsides which constitute a portion of the farm, the stalks were few and spindly, and the amount of cotton produced scarcely paid for the labor and expense involved.

Now, there are, however, varieties of cotton which are suited to each one of these three states of soil conditions, and if this planter had been fully informed of the character of cotton which was especially suited to production upon each one of his three types of soil he might have raised a full crop over his entire plantation, instead of raising a full crop upon less than one-third of it. This merely serves to show that no amount of labor could make this one variety of cotton grow to equal advantage upon the different types of soil found upon this plantation, and this fundamental fact is true of all cotton plantations of the South, upon which are annually raised $650,000,000 worth of this staple. When, through the efforts of the Bureau of Soils in studying the adaptation of soils to the different varieties of cotton, it shall be possible to tell each planter what specific variety of cotton to produce upon each of the soils found upon his farm, the annual profits derived from this crop will be far more than doubled, and, in my opinion, the returns secured by American agriculture from this single piece of information would far more than pay to the American public all of the sums which have been or shall be expended for the purpose of securing this information in regard to soils.

The same is true of the other great staple crops, corn, wheat, oats, rice, tobacco, and various fruits and market, garden, and truck crops. The work of this Bureau in investigating the soils and the soil resources of the nation and the undeveloped agricultural possibilities of the different localities and different States is fundamental in its character and underlies the efforts along all other agricultural lines, whether in the production of plants or of animals. It is the basic knowledge upon which all experimentation and the development of American agriculture must rest.

The State of Georgia comprises a total land area of 37,747,200 acres of land. Of this amount 26,392,057 acres are included in farms, but only 10,615,644 acres of all this area are improved farm lands. The undeveloped agricultural resources of Georgia constitute two and one-half times the portion of the State which has already been developed. It is through the operation of such forces as those controlled by the Bureau of Soils that the greater part of this unutilized agricultural domain may be made productive and profitable. The State of Georgia itself is doing its best to develop these resources and to increase the prosperity of its agricultural classes.

Within the year provision has been made by the State for eleven agricultural high schools, one in every Congressional district of the State, and the locations for these high schools have been selected through the cooperation of the Bureau of Soils, which furnished trained experts to advise with the State authorities in the selection of such localities as would be most representative of the broader classes of soils and the agricultural possibilities of the State. With each one of these eleven agricultural schools and in addition the agricultural college and experiment station of the State working upon local problems, the soil surveys in the different portions of the State are becoming of greater value than ever before. The students at these colleges and schools will learn beyond a question or a doubt the character of crops which may be raised upon these soils, the methods by which the land must be prepared, the fertilizers which must be used to insure the best results, and having learned these upon the experimental farms through their own practice, on returning to their homes they may, through the use of the soil-survey maps, put this information to its practical use on their own farms and their home communities.

In this way, and through the use of the soil-survey maps, the entire State of Georgia will in due time become one of the great experiment stations of which the information secured in one locality may be applied in others more remote, and whereby the wasteful methods of incomplete knowledge may be supplanted by those of a scientific understanding of the capabilities of every acre of soil. The same is true of other States and of other communities, and a great impetus to the agricultural production and industry of the country may be given through a proper support of these basal investigations which underlie the practice of all agricultural art. I shall not attempt to go through the whole range of this subject the country over, but I shall at the proper time offer an amendment increasing the appropriation for the Soil Bureau by $100,000. I shall then present a few more remarks on this great question. [Applause.]

Therefore, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words with regard to the 320-acre dry-farm bill, commonly known as the Smoot bill, which Members from the West are endeavoring to impress upon the consideration of Congress and endeavoring to have passed. I ask permission to insert at this point a copy of the bill, in order that it may be considered in connnection with my remarks. The bill that I shall insert is not the original bill introduced by Senator SMOOT, but is a compromise bill agreed upon by Senators and Representatives from the Western States, and introduced in the Senate by Senator SMOOT, and in the House by the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, Mr. MONDELL:

A bill to provide for an enlarged homestead.

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who is a qualified entryman under the homestead laws of the United States may enter, by legal subdivisions, under the provisions of this act, in the States of Colorado, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, and the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, 320 acres, or less, of nonmineral, nonirrigable, unreserved and unappropriated surveyed public lands which do not contain merchantable timber, located in a reasonably compact body, and not over 1½ miles in extreme length.

SEC. 2. That any person applying to enter land under the provisions of this act shall make and subscribe before the proper officer an affidavit as required by section 2290 of the Revised Statutes, and in addition thereto shall make affidavit that the land sought to be entered is of the character described in section 1 of this act, and shall pay the fees now required to be paid under the homestead laws.

SEC. 3. That any homestead entryman now occupying lands of the character hereinafter described, heretofore entered by him, upon which final proof has not been made, shall have the right to enter public lands, subject to the provisions of this act, lying contiguous to his former entry which shall not, together with the original entry, exceed 320 acres, and residence upon and cultivation of the original entry shall be deemed as residence upon and cultivation of the additional entry.

SEC. 4. That at the time of making final proof as provided in section 2291 of the Revised Statutes the entryman under this act shall, in addition to the proofs and affidavits required under the said section, prove by two credible witnesses that at least one-eighth of the area embraced in his entry was continuously cultivated to agricultural crops other than native grasses beginning with the second year of the entry, and that at least one-fourth of the area embraced in the entry was so continuously cultivated beginning with the third year of the entry.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be held to affect the right of a qualified entryman to make homestead entry in the States named in section 1 of this act under the provisions of section 2289 of the Revised Statutes, but no person who has made entry under this act shall be entitled to make homestead entry under the provisions of said section, and no entry made under this act shall be commuted.

SEC. 6. That whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall find that any tracts of land subject to entry under this act do not have upon them such a sufficient supply of water suitable for domestic purposes as would make continuous residence upon the lands possible without serious hardship to entrymen, he may in his discretion designate such tracts of land, and thereafter they shall be subject to entry under this act without the necessity of residence: Provided, That in such event the area cultivated in any such entry shall not be less than one-eighth of the entire area of the entry during the second year, one-fourth during the third year, and one-half during the fourth and fifth years after the date of such entry.

Before taking up the bill itself let us review for a moment the public-land policy of our country. Going back to the year in which the national homestead law was passed and following on down the several acts of Congress looking to the settlement of the public lands of the United States, the policy of our Government has been to place public lands into private ownership. The Government has never attempted to make money out of the public domain. The Government has never attempted to obtain for the lands which it had at its disposal any compensation that might at all have been considered commensurate with the value of the lands that were given to the public. The Government has said to the people: "Go upon the public lands; make homes there; build towns and cities and villages in the wilderness; erect churches and schoolhouses; maintain roads and highways and bridges, and for the hardship that you will endure in laying out the great work that is before you as pioneers the Government will give to you a small parcel of land." The laws have been varied under which land has been granted to the settler by our Federal Government. Under the provisions of some of the laws residence upon the land was required. Under the provisions of other laws the laying out of certain improvements, the setting out of trees, etc., were what the Government required. Under the provisions of other laws it was required that a small amount of money should be paid by the settler to the Government for the land in question, and at all times it has been the policy of the Government to establish homes and receive for its compensation a greater nation of splendid communities and thrifty, prosperous people. Look to the States of the Mississippi Valley; look to the States of Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska. The tremendous progress that has come to those States during the last half century is in large part due to the generous policy of the Government in the handling of her public domain. The same policy has existed in part with regard to the public domain of the Western and Mountain States, and the largest part of the available land that is of highest use for agricultural purposes has already been acquired by the private individual, and in that section of country as a result of this policy there are to-day thousands upon thousands of splendid properties and happy homes.

We have now come to the time when the present land laws are inadequate to meet the demands of the present character of land that is available for settlement. Millions upon millions of acres of land in the arid and semiarid regions of the West are to-day waiting the share of the plow to be converted into producing fields, but our land laws are insufficient, and as a result these millions upon millions of acres of land are to-day lying idle, or at any rate are not used for their highest producing purposes. The dry farm homestead bill has for its object the granting of a homestead of 320 acres to the individual settler. The terms of this bill are more rigorous than the terms of the general homestead law and the terms have been made more rigorous in order to comply with the demands of the Eastern Representatives and Senators who do not understand the situation that confronts the people of the West. We propose under this bill to grant to each homesteader who has not heretofore used his right the privilege of acquiring 320 acres of unappropriated, nonirrigable, nonmineral public lands, which contain no merchantable timber, providing that the homesteader will live upon this land for a period of five years and make during that five years improvements which will show to the United States his good faith in taking the land for a home. We ask this because the present homestead law is inadequate to the condition of the lands that remain unappropriated and which are known as public lands. For the most part the lands that still belong to the Government in the West are arid or semiarid in character. Until the last few years it was supposed that they were desert, that they were unfit for settlement, and that unless water could be turned upon the lands from some running stream that it would be forever impossible for our people to successfully maintain homes thereon.

But our people have been progressing in the science of farming and agriculture as they have been progressing in other lines, and it has now come to the point where the rigorous demand upon even the soil of the United States, abundant and extensive as it is, is such as to warrant the farming of the lands which heretofore have been regarded as of no more importance than an equal area of desert waste. By means of lately discovered methods of tilling the soil; by means of lately discovered grains and forage plants; by means of lately discovered or transplanted trees and shrubs, we have found that it is possible to make these very desert lands attractive, and while not of the value of the lands that have been in settlement for these many years, yet capable of contributing in large part to the resources and wealth of the Western States. One hundred and sixty acres, however, of this kind of land is not sufficient for the farmer who seeks in this hard means to establish his home and make the soil fruitful. The area of 320 acres that we ask for under this bill, in my judgment, is not as sufficient an area as we should ask for, but it is the area that in the judgment of the Members from the West should be asked for at this time, and therefore, it is the amount that I shall contend for in the remarks that I make. Three hundred and twenty acres of land sounds like a large area to the person who is accustomed to living amid green fields, splendid orchards, and bountiful gardens, but let me say to you that 320 acres of the land that is to-day available under the provisions of this bill, if we can enact it into law, will not by any manner of means represent in value 80 acres or 40 acres of the tremendous areas that were granted without cost under the homestead law to the settlers of the Middle West and of the Pacific coast and Mountain States.

Already we have magnificent lands in Idaho and in the other States of the mountain region. We have lands there that are as fine as any lands in our whole United States, but these lands have been acquired by private individuals; these lands have been settled for many years the same as lands in your States in the Middle West and in the East. The lands that this bill would apply to are not lands of this character, but are lands that to-day are covered with sagebrush and grease wood and juniper shrub for the most part and which have such little value that although the years have passed by during which the people of the West and of the whole country have had the opportunity of acquiring them under the provisions of a 160-acre homestead law, they have not yet been acquired. As an evidence of the fact that the lands that remain to-day unsettled are not the equal of the lands that were available for settlement twenty or thirty or forty years ago, let me say this: There was a time when nearly every entryman who filed upon a piece of land made final proof. By and by as the best character of lands became absorbed by private ownership many of the entrymen were unable to make final proof because of the character of the lands upon which they settled or the climatic condition of the country. By and by one out of every two who entered upon a piece of land found himself unable to comply with the provisions of the homestead law before making his proof, notwithstanding the expenses he had already been put to in making his entry and establishing his home, and this condition of affairs has continued with the lands of better character being eliminated constantly until last year about four persons out of every five who made entries upon homestead lands were compelled, by reason of the hard condition that they found themselves laboring under, to abandon their homestead entries and try to make a living for themselves or for their families by some other means. Only one homestead entryman out of about every five completed his proof, which goes to show that the character of the land that is still available for settlement is not comparable with the character of the land that was available for settlement in Idaho, in Wyoming, and in the other Western States and States of the Middle West twenty-five and thirty and forty years ago.

As a further evidence of the fact that the present land laws are not adequate I call your attention to the slow rate at which the public lands are being acquired under the homestead law under its present terms limiting entry to 160 acres of land. The figures which I give apply to the States mentioned in the bill with the exception of North Dakota, and North Dakota has been omitted from the terms of the bill as it has been reported from the House Committee on the Public Lands.

	Area final homestead entries, 1907.	Total area vacant public lands.	Years required to absorb land at present rate.
	Acres.	Acres.
Arizona	12,467	45,571,305	3,655
California	60,770	1,859,109	31
Colorado	145,677	28,472,203	195
Idaho	176,548	30,989,840	113
Montana	185,790	51,398,631	277
New Mexico	165,608	49,890,637	301
Nevada	6,981	61,204,087	877
Oregon	127,410	19,739,649	155
Utah	6,436	38,279,631	5,948
Washington	333,423	6,260,980	188
Wyoming	105,400	36,726,337	345
Total	1,327,510	370,392,409	285

These figures tell a remarkable story. They tell that in Idaho if the public lands available for homestead entry continue to be acquired in as rapid degree, or rather, I should say, in as slow degree as they were last year, it would require one hundred and thirteen years before all the available lands would be disposed of. These figures tell that it would take two hundred and eighty-five years for all the lands in the States which I have enumerated to pass into private ownership, and offer a powerful argument in support of the bill for which I contend.

The President of the United States realized the limitations of the present law, as fully appears from the message which he sent to this Congress when we assembled in December last. In that message he declared:

> The land-law system which was designed to meet the needs of the fertile and well-watered regions of the Middle West has largely broken down when applied to the dryer regions of the Great Plains, the mountains, and much of the Pacific slope, where a farm of 160 acres is inadequate for self-support.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office says in his report to the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1907:

> Dry farming, or the raising of crops in semiarid regions by special methods of agriculture, has passed the experimental stage in many localities. No law adapted to the entry of lands suitable for this purpose exists, as the desert-land law is inapplicable, and the homestead law, besides requiring residence, is too restricted in the area of land that may be entered.
> I therefore recommend the enactment of a measure applicable only to those States and Territories containing semiarid lands, permitting the entry, under the agricultural classification above, by any qualified resident citizen of the State or Territory where the land sought to be entered is situated, of not exceeding 640 acres of land (in as compact a form as possible) not capable of artificial irrigation, which does not contain sufficient moisture to produce a natural growth of trees, and which, because of the fact that it does not furnish potable water sufficient for domestic use or because of other conditions arising out of the semiaridity of the land, is not suitable for continuous habitation. Residence should not be required as a prerequisite to patent, but proof should be required of the planting and raising of consecutive crops of valuable agricultural products (other than native grasses) for a fixed period before final proof; provided, however, that careful restrictions be imposed to insure that the entries are made for the sole use and benefit of entrymen for the purpose of actual cultivation and not to increase range holdings, create monopolies of land, or other abuses.

This land under the very terms of the bill is land upon which water can not be placed by artificial means, land upon which water can not be placed from reservoir or from running streams. If such were the case it would not be classified as nonirrigable. It is what we might call "bench land"—land that lies just above the lands that have been made possible of cultivation by means of water being turned upon them. The passage of this bill will enable the farmers of the West who go upon this land to benefit not only themselves, but to benefit the settlers who live upon the lower lands where irrigation is possible. Everybody knows that as the higher lands are cultivated year by year the water is conserved within the ground and this will be a benefit to the lands that are lying below, and will in time permit the waters that go with those lands to be used for other irrigation purposes. Another reason why I urge the passage of this bill lies in the fact that in our great States of the West much of the land is not to-day aiding in the support and maintenance of State and county governments. There is no means that is practicable by which revenues from Government lands can be turned into the treasuries of our counties and our States. Take, for instance, the State of Idaho. Probably not to exceed one-tenth of all the land within that magnificent State is to-day in private ownership. What is the result? Why, the property owners of that one-tenth of the area of the State of Idaho are compelled to pay taxes for the support of State and county governments, extending over the entire area of the State. But someone says that where people are not, there is no expense to government. This is a false deduction. It is true in every country that very often police regulations bear down more heavily upon sparsely settled communities than they do upon communities that are thickly settled, and it is true throughout the entire West that while a county or a State may receive taxes from one-tenth of the land within its domain that that State would soon be declared recreant to its duty if it failed to protect the life and property of the citizens who live in the most remote portion of its domain. We need that every acre of land shall be reduced to private ownership in order that the highest use of the land may be attained and in order that it may become capable of bearing its share of the burden of the expense of county and State government.

This bill is not in every detail the bill that I would pass if it were within my power. Probably this bill does not represent the wishes of any Member of Congress in either the House or the Senate from the Western States. This bill is the result of repeated conferences. Some Members of Congress believe that we should grant to these settlers a 640-acre homestead. For myself I believe that if the time is not ripe now for the grant of a 640-acre homestead, that after the bill which we now propose has done its work, in the course of not many years the remaining land must be disposed of under a still larger homestead law. The 320-acre provision of this bill represents the combined judgment of the Members of Congress of both House and Senate from the Western States. Again, this bill provides that a person who has filed upon a homestead, but who has not as yet made final proof, may have the privilege of acquiring an additional 160 acres of land of this character, providing the land upon which he entered is land of the character described in this bill, and providing the additional 160 acres of land which he may select is contiguous to the land he has already entered upon. I believe in the provisions of that section, but I do not believe that the provisions go far enough. I think that no matter whether the settler has completed his proof or not, if he has acquired 160 acres of land of the character of that contemplated in this bill, that he should have the privilege of acquiring an additional 160 acres of land, and that that limitation should not be fixed upon the person who has made final proof; but, as I said, this bill represents the combined judgment of the Members from the different States from the West, who have held repeated conferences upon this measure, and this is another point where my judgment was overruled by the judgment of others. And so I could go on. I could enumerate other features that were objectionable to me, or which I was in favor of, but which were not included in the measure. This is not necessary, and I shall simply say that on the whole I believe the measure is a just measure, that it is a necessary measure, and that if it is passed now it will do much to aid in the settlement of the unsettled portions of the Western States, of which Idaho is one.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have had handed to me this moment the following clipping from the Washington Times of this date:

GALLINGER FAVORS ANTIBETTING BILL—BELIEVES SENATE WILL PASS MEASURE AFTER CONSIDERATION—ERROR IN PHRASING NULLIFIES BILLS PASSED BY THE HOUSE.

"Yes; I am in favor of the bill," said Senator GALLINGER, chairman of Senate District Committee, to-day, when asked about the Sims measure to repress race-track grambling, which recently passed the House as an amendment to the bill to widen the Benning road.

"At the same time, the bill can not be passed at once. It will doubtless be taken up by the committee at its meeting Friday. But it will probably have to be referred to a subcommittee and duly considered by that subcommittee. It is not likely that a bill of this importance can be forced through. It is entirely likely that the legislation will be passed in due time, but just when it is impossible to say."

Senator GALLINGER pointed out that there might be objection to passing the bill in the form in which it passed the House, and that the Senate might prefer to put it through as a separate measure.

In this connection the attention of Senator GALLINGER has been called to a blunder made by the House in passing the bill to widen Benning road and these other bills:

For the extension of Ninth street NW.

For the entension of Girard street NW.

For the extension of New York avenue from its present terminus, near Fourth street NE., to the Bladensburg road.

Senator GALLINGER has been apprised by the Commissioners, who in turn had been advised of it by Auditor Tweedale, that in passing these bills the word "appropriated" has been stricken out and the expression "authorized to be expended" substituted. Auditor Tweedale has informed the Commissioners that under the language the measures would be unenforcible, and that the courts construe appropriation laws strictly.

It will be necessary for the Senate to change the language in accordance with this suggestion before the proposed legislation is enacted.

Friends of this legislation are very uneasy for fear some serious blunder was made in the passage of this bill that will render it null and void.

I fear no such results. It is true that upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the amendment was made whereby the word "appropriated" was stricken from the bill and the words "authorized to be expended" substituted. I did not seriously resist the amendment for the reason that I had no time to look up the usual language used in such bills, and as Mr. MADDEN is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and a very able and careful member of that committee, I had not thought that he was not accurate in the language inserted as his amendment. But this constitutes not the slightest obstacle in the way of getting the bill through expeditiously. I drew up the amendment at my seat with lead pencil in a hurry, and I hope the Senate will, if thought best, make any amendment that will in any way strengthen the law, and I have not the slightest doubt that the House will readily concur in the Senate amendments without sending the bill back to the House District Committee or by nonconcurring in the Senate amendments, causing the bill to be sent to conference. While I have spoken to but one member of the Senate District Committee, I have no doubt that the Senate will act expeditiously, and all fears upon the part of friends of the measure, I think, are groundless.

Local public sentiment could hardly be stronger in favor of this legislation. Every newspaper in the District has spoken favorably of the legislation. I now read from the Evening Star a report of the proceedings as reported in yesterday's issue of that paper:

STOPS TRACK BETTING—HOUSE PASSES BILL TO PREVENT GAMBLING AT BENNING—CREDIT DUE TO MR. SIMS—HE PERSEVERES TO SUCCESS DESPITE REPEATED OPPOSITION—PUTS ASSOCIATES ON RECORD—ONLY FOUR REPRESENTATIVES FINALLY FOUND LINED UP AGAINST THE MEASURE.

"It shall be unlawful for any person or association of persons in the District of Columbia to bet, gamble, or make books or pools on the result of any trotting race or running race of horses, or boat race, or race of any kind, or on any election, or any contest of any kind, or game of baseball."

Through the energy and legislative resourcefulness of Representative SIMS of Tennessee, ranking minority member of the House District Committee, betting at Benning yesterday afternoon received what may be its death blow. Mr. SIMS managed to secure the passage, as an amendment to the bill for the widening of Benning road, of his measure, introduced in the House last Friday, amending section 869 of the District Code so as to prohibit gambling and book making in any form anywhere in the District of Columbia. The existing law against book making on races forbids it only within a mile of the city's boundaries.

This happens to be one case where credit for a praiseworthy enactment of this sort may justly be given to one man. Representative SIMS in this fight had no help of his colleagues on the District Committee, that committee having voted at last Thursday's regular meeting against the bill which passed the House yesterday. It is true that the committee had under consideration an antigambling measure prepared by Rrepresentative CAMPBELL of Kansas, chairman of the Judiciary subcommittee, but it is a perfectly safe bet that Mr. CAMPBELL'S bill, which had been tabled, certainly would not have seen the light of day during the present Benning meet if at all during the present session.

The bill for the widening of Benning road had no sooner been read in the House, sitting as the board of aldermen of the District, when Mr. SIMS jumped to his feet.

MR. SIMS'S AMENDMENT.

"Mr. Chairman," he cried, "I move to amend the bill by inserting an additional section." Here is the section which later, after trials, tribulations, and considerable opposition, was enacted:

"That section 869 of the act of Congress entitled 'An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1901, be amended by striking out the words 'in the cities of Washington and Georgetown' and the words 'or within said District, within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities.'"

Representative CRUMPACKER of Indiana reserved a point of order upon the amendment, and Mr. SIMS, after reading section 869 of the District Code, explained as follows:

"Under a decision of the court it has been held, as I understand it, and as I am informed, that under this section of the code, it does not include the Benning track, and does not make it, therefore, unlawful for any person to bet on a horse race at Benning; but by striking out the words 'in the cities of Washington and Georgetown' and 'or within said district within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities' it reads as follows:

"'It shall be unlawful for any person or association of persons in the District of Columbia to bet, gamble, or make books or pools on the result of any trotting race or running race of horses, or boat race, or race of any kind, or on any election, or on any contest of any kind, or game of baseball.'

"The object of the amendment is simply to extend the antigambling laws of the District to the entire District, so as to make gambling and betting unlawful in every part of the District. Under the language of the section as it is in the act, it is within 1 mile of the limits of the city of Washington, and 1 mile does not extend to the limits of the District of Columbia, and therefore the courts are without jurisdiction to enforce the law."

After a few facetious remarks from the irrepressible CHARLIE LANDIS, Mr. CRUMPACKER, who had reserved the point of order against the amendment, again secured the floor.

"I reserve the point of order," he said, "for the purpose of ascertaining what the amendment really meant and what its significance really was. I find that it is to extend the antigambling law to the race track at Benning, where I suppose it ought to apply if it applies anywhere. The amendment is doubtless subject to a point of order. It is somewhat illogical to amend the bill in this way, but I do not propose to stand in the way of the enactment of proper antigambling laws for the District. I believe in that kind of legislation, and, therefore, I withdraw the point of order and will support the amendment.

Mr. SIMS thanked Mr. CRUMPACKER, and Representative KAHN, of California, a member of the House District Committee, rose to his feet.

POINT OF ORDER RAISED.

"I desire to make the point of order," said Mr. KAHN, "and to say in that connection that this matter has not been before our committee in such a way that the committee could take action on it. It is an unusual way to come in here and offer an amendment on a bill of this character, and I submit it is of sufficiently serious importance to be considered by the committee. I make the point of order."

On request of Mr. SIMS, Mr. KAHN temporarily reserved his point of order that Mr. SIMS might explain the attitude of the District Committee.

"A bill of this kind," said he, "except broader, and going to the extent of making it unlawful to make wagering contracts on futures, was introduced and went to the District Committee. I offered this provision as a substitute for the bill, and it was voted down. Then, after consideration of the bill, which included this and other matters, the bill of the gentleman from Kansas was tabled. So the subject-matter has been considered by the committee, but I am sorry to be compelled to say that it did not meet with the approval of a majority of those present.

"I hope the gentleman from California will not make the point of order, because here is a law which plainly says it shall be unlawful to lay wagers and make bets within 1 mile of the limits of Washington and Georgetown, leaving all the rest of the District without protection of a law which is thought to be necessary within the city. Now, if the existing law is a good law 1 mile beyond the limits of these cities, why is it not a good law a little farther—to the limits of the District of Columbia, which does not exceed 10 miles square. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his point of order."

But Mr. KAHN was obdurate. He insisted that the bill was brought up in committee for the first time at the last meeting and was not fully considered. He said he was just as anxious as Mr. SIMS to limit gambling; that he had never laid a wager on a horse race in his life, but he did not think this was a proper way to legislate, and insisted on his point of order, which was sustained by Representative DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, in the chair.

Representative SHACKLEFORD, of Missouri, who has a profoundly serious countenance and a fund of unconscious humor, asked Mr. SIMS why it was, if he wanted to stop gambling, he desired to widen Benning road so the gamblers could get to it more easily.

Mr. MANN, of Illinois, seeing an opportunity for some fun, demanded that Mr. SIMS answer whether or not the bill was in the interest of the Benning race track.

RACING WITHOUT BETTING.

"I certainly did not think so," replied Mr. SIMS, "and, moreover, the amendment I offered was to prevent betting, not horse racing. You can go out and see all the horses run you want to and spend all the time you want to there and not lose your money." [Laughter.]

"Benning would not last very long if there was no betting there," suggested Mr. MANN.

"This matter of betting," remarked Mr. MADDEN, drolly, "is like the question of the bedbug; there is not so much objection to the bedbug but to the infernal method he has of getting a living." [Laughter.]

The Benning bill was then laid aside and other District matters taken up.

THE HOUSE LINED UP.

Mr. SIMS got in his slick and resourceful legislative tactics when the Committee of the Whole arose and reported action on the various bills. When the bill for the widening of Benning road was reported to the House—of course without the Sims amendment, that having been stricken out on a point of order—Mr. SIMS moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report the bill back with his previously offered amendment in it. A vote was taken on this proposition and the "noes" seemed to have it, but when Mr. SIMS called for a division the record showed seventy Members in favor of Mr. SIMS's proposition and only four against.

Then the Tennesseean moved that the bill be called up as amended and passed.

"The bill has been recommitted to the committee," remarked Uncle Joe.

"With a direction for them to make a report," returned Mr. SIMS.

"But the gentleman from Tennessee did not put 'forthwith' in his motion," commented the Speaker.

"Well," said Mr. SIMS, nothing daunted, "I move that 'forthwith' be added to the motion."

Again the bill was laid aside while measures for the extension of Ninth street, Girard street, and New York avenue were disposed of, and then Mr. SIMS returned to the charge, by moving to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the widening of Benning road was recommitted to the District Committee. The motion was agreed to, and then Mr. SIMS, extricating his measure from the parliamentary tangle into which it had inadvertently been led, moved to recommit once more in the same language with the lacking "forthwith" added.

Chairman SMITH, of the committee, wanted to know what "forthwith" meant—whether it meant at once or within twenty-four hours.

"It means at once," said Mr. SIMS, belligerently.

"It means forthwith," remarked the Speaker pacifically.

BILL REPORTED AND PASSED.

After some more sparring, Chairman SMITH rose and announced that he was ready to report the bill with amendment. A vote was then taken on the Sims amendment and on the bill, and the measure was passed without further opposition.

At the close of the festivities Mr. SIMS was warmly congratulated by his friends on the House floor for the masterly manner in which he had handled an intricate parliamentary situation.

The House also passed during yesterday's District day session bills to provide for the registration of all cases of tuberculosis in the District; to regulate the establishment and maintenance of private hospitals and asylums in the District; to amend an act to extend Meridian place NW.; to extend Ninth street NW. from Barry place to Euclid street; to extend Girard street NW. from its present terminus to Fifteenth street NW.; to extend New York avenue from its present terminus near Fourth street NE. to the Bladensburg road; to extend the time limit for the completion of the lines of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company twelve months; to allow firemen injured in the course of duty to be treated at the expense of the firemen's pension fund, and to license all drivers for vehicles for hire and tax them $1 a year.

COMMISSIONERS MUCH GRATIFIED.

The members of the Board of Commissioners this morning expressed gratification over the success of Representative SIMS yesterday. The Commissioners propose to make every effort to secure the bill's approval in the Senate.

Commissioner Macfarland, who has been persistently fighting the gamblers at Benning for some time, said to-day:

"I am exceedingly glad that the House adopted the SIMS amendment and I trust the Senate may adopt it soon enough to stop the gambling at Benning during the present race meeting. I still think that it could have been broken up by vigorous action under the present law, but in view of the difference of opinion about the law, amendment of it seems more necessary than ever. The Commissioners recommended legislation as the most certain method of stamping out this evil, just as Governor Hughes did in New York, and in this as in their other efforts in this matter have met with similar opposition and misrepresentation. For example, the suggestion has been made that it was not respectful to the law and the courts to make a vigorous effort to break up the operations of the gamblers at Benning, in view of a court decision that a particular case based on certain evidence and on an indictment drawn in a certain way could not be maintained. There was nothing in the decision to show that a case with a better indictment and different evidence would not be upheld by the same court. No court has ever suggested that the present law is void for unconstitutionality or any other reason. As a matter of fact, the police are preparing to file informations on evidence collected under the very same law which it has been claimed would not permit us to make arrests. My idea is that the best way to show respect to the law is to enforce it. However, the prompt passage of the SIMS amendment will stop the gambling at Benning, and every good citizen should advocate it earnestly."

Commissioner West said: "The passage of the SIMS bill in the House meets with my hearty approval, and I hope that it can be taken up promptly in the Senate and enacted into law. Under the law passed in 1891 book making and pool selling were legalized in the territory occupied by the race track, and the law has been upheld by the courts. Under these circumstances the way to abolish race-track gambling in the District of Columbia is to repeal this law. The action of the House is, to my mind, a step in the right direction, and I do not believe that the Senate will fail to act when that body appreciates, as in my judgment it will, the fact that public sentiment in this District is overwhelmingly in favor of the abolition of race-track gambling here."

The following is an editorial appearing in the Evening Star of the same date:

THE SIMS AMENDMENT.

The SIMS amendment, adopted yesterday by the House after a strenuous performance in which the author of the proposition showed a high degree of parliamentary skill, strikes a deathblow at race gambling in this District. If adopted by the Senate in its present form, it will put an end to the semiannual performances at Benning, which cost the people of the capital heavily, both financially and morally.

By eliminating the words of the statute "within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities," the amendment carries the prohibition against gambling in all forms to the District boundary and puts an end to the shameful discrimination between the games of chance played at tables or with apparatus or cards and the gambling device which masquerades under the guise of the sport of racing horses.

But the SIMS amendment goes further and seeks to spread upon the statute a definition which will leave no possible question as to the intent of the law in the matter of race betting. The proposed new language is as follows:

"Anyone who anywhere acts as a layer of odds or bookmaker, or by any means induces or entices others to bet, directly or indirectly, whether he does or does not make a memorandum of bets or in any way records them, is liable for making books under this act."

This clause is designed to meet the situation created by the first of the now pending decisions of the court, which, by classifying a bookmaker occupying a fixed position in the established betting ring as one who sets up a gaming table, within the meaning of section 865 of the code, led to the evolution of the ridiculous, but at present effective, expedient of keeping the bookmakers on the move. If the clause is adopted, any method of receiving bets, wherever the bookmaker may stand, whether at rest or in motion, whether carrying a chart or sheet or working solely through memory, becomes illegal and punishable.

The great requirement, however, is met by the simple device of cutting from the statute the words "within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities," which establish a zone of permissible race-track gambling covering nearly two-thirds of the total area of the District.

The measure, thus happily secured by dint of Mr. SIMS's persistent and skillful efforts in the House, now goes to the Senate for consideration. The fact that it is in the form of an amendment to a street-widening bill does not lessen its significance or the responsibility of the upper House in the premises. The local sentiment in favor of the abolition of race-track gambling is unmistakable. Let the Senate committee open its doors to the people and there will soon be no chance to doubt the demand of the community that the anomaly of the law which permits gambling in one part of the capital and prohibits it in another be ended.

It is hoped in the public interest that the action of the Senate on this bill will be as prompt and decisive as that of the House has been.

The following is an editorial from the Washington Herald of same date:

CONGRESS AND RACE-TRACK GAMBLING.

If the Senate does its simple duty promptly—a duty that should not consume ten minutes—the race-track gambling evil, which now disgraces the National capital, can be suppressed before the week is out.

Of course the Senate will perform that duty. Certainly Chairman GALLINGER, of the District Committee, and all the Senators who value the good name of Washington City may be depended upon to see that no obstacle be put in the way of the passage of so righteous a measure.

Thanks to Representative SIMS, the House, by practically a unanimous vote, has passed a bill, clear and to the point in its provisions, which wipes out the mile limit and exempts no part of the District of Columbia from the operation of the antigambling law. Unincumbered and aiming directly at the Benning lawlessness, the bill leaves no loophole for argument or obstruction. The House naturally went on record overwhelmingly against further public gambling within the very shadow of the Capitol.

If the Jockey Club can continue its racing meets without the disgraceful and demoralizing gambling features so injurious to the business as well as the morals of the community, no possible objection can be raised to them. On the contrary, the meets will be welcomed. But if, as the Jockey Club itself admits, racing depends upon gambling, then the sooner the whole business is outlawed here, as it has been outlawed in nearly all cities, the better for the capital of the nation.

Now, it is in order for the Senate speedily to complete the good work of the House.

The foregoing newspaper articles and editorials speak for themselves. They show that the demand for this legislation is urgent. Immediate action is demanded by all good people everywhere. I have received a flood of letters congratulating the House on its good work, and all, without the exception of one, urging prompt and energetic action by the Senate, and I believe the hopes of the supporters of this measure will be realized at as early a day as it is possible for cautious and careful consideration to be given to this measure by that great body at the other end of this Capitol.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, during the time allotted me I desire to enter upon a fuller discussion of the great question of government aid to the public roads of the entire country. I am a member of the vast army of agriculturists, whose means go most largely to the support of government, but whose material interests find the least consideration at the hands of the national governing body. The farmer needs better roads for the transportation of his crops, and the time has come, in my opinion, for the National Government to inaugurate a policy that shall give him the best system of roads known to the world.

The good-roads question is no longer a merely local one. The great questions of transportation have given the country roads of the entire country an importance equal to that of the railroads and of the public waterways. No matter how much of agricultural or mineral wealth is transported over these systems of transportation to final destination and market, the initial transportation of all of it is over the country road. From the farms or mines to the stations or the wharves is the first element of the transportation problem, while from wharves and stations to the market is but its second phase.

The first element falls most heavily on the producers of agricultural and mineral wealth and very frequently destroys what under more favorable circumstances might have been a profitable venture. Bad roads from the mines or farms to the wharves or stations either call for the transportation of a lighter load or the maintenance of an unnecessary number of transporting animals. Good roads will provide larger loads with less power, a saving in time, expense, and trouble.

What value comes from the farms and mines?

The Agricultural Yearbook for 1905 gives the following figures showing the productive power of the farms in that year:

Corn	bushels	2,707,993,000
Wheat	do	692,979,000
Oats	do	953,216,000
Barley	do	136,651,000
Rye	do	28,486,000
Buckwheat	do	14,585,000
Potatoes, 1904	do	332,830,000
Hay, 1905	tons	60,531,000
Cotton, 1904	pounds	6,722,000,000
Tobacco, 1904	do	700,561,000
Hops, 1905	do	51,200,000
Flaxseed, 1904	do	23,401,000
Rice, 1904	do	1,163,000,000
Sugar in United States	tons	342,000

These figures indicate an enormous tonnage originating at the farm and carried in its initial journey to market over the country roads. So much for the grain products.

Animals.	Number.
Milch cows	20,810,000
Cattle, including milch cows	68,738,000
Horses	21,714,000
Mules	3,584,000
Sheep	50,869,000
Swine	53,987,000

These, with the exception of the milch cows and a part of the horses and mules, form an enormous item of farm tonnage going over country roads on the initial journey to market. The number of horses, mules, and cattle provided for hauling over bad roads is unnecessarily increased, and this, together with the expense of their maintenance, makes a burden on the farmer which in all good conscience should be removed.

It has been estimated that good roads throughout the country would do away with the necessity for 2,500,000 of the horses, cattle, and mules now required for carrying farm products to shipping points.

The mineral products were:

Gold, 1904	fine ounces	16,780,000
Silver, 1904	do	168,320,000
Coal, 1904	tons	314,562,000
Pig iron, 1905	do	22,992,000
Crude petroleum	gallons	4,917,812,000

These are immense tonnages and represent not only the railroad and water transportation, but that other transportation, the one neglected and forgotten, the transportation to the shipping points.

The total mileage of all the railroads in the country in 1904 was 212,348 miles. The improved county roads in California alone in that year aggregated 50,000 miles, or nearly one-fourth of the railroad mileage of the country. Maryland had 16,000 miles; Massachusetts, 20,000; New York, 14,000. These four States have an aggregate of improved roads of nearly one-half the railroad mileage of the country. From this it will be seen how great is the aggregate of the improved and unimproved country roads of the country, equal factors in transportation with the railroads.

The freight carried by all these roads in 1904 aggregated 1,275,000,000 tons, or the unthinkable quantity of 2,550,000,000 pounds, earning for the railroads $1,374,100,000, or more than $1 per ton. There were 9,840,000,000 cars of freight traveling over the country that year. Can anyone figure out the enormous number of wagonloads, the enormous number of trips made by the 15,000,000 horses and mules carrying these colossal weights to the nearest station? Will anyone say, in the face of figures like these, that the initial transportation necessitated for this enormous railroad traffic should not have the most favorable consideration at our hands?

NATIONAL AID TO RAILROADS.

The United States has not been niggard in its donations to railroad corporations. From the Land Office report of 1903 it appears that the National Government has patented to railroad corporations up to June 30 of that year an aggregate of 64,000,000 acres, and to States for the use of railroads 40,000,000 acres, or a total of railroad grants of 104,000,000 acres, and for wagon-road grants 2,500,000 acres, or less than one-fiftieth as much. Is it fair to make fish of one element of transportation and fowl of another?

Besides all this, the United States Government has guaranteed the indebtedness of the Pacific railroads, amounting, principal and interest, to $138,000,000. The waterways of the country, through the various river and harbor bills that have passed through Congress since the formation of the Republic, have been given by direct appropriations from the Treasury of the United States about $450,000,000. Transportation from the shipping points to market over railways and boats has had ample attention from the Government of the United States, while transportation from the farm to the shipping point has had almost nothing.

In any estimate of aid to railroads the indirect aid given them by the Government should not be overlooked. If we consider that we are now paying the railroads $40,000,000 per annum for the carrying of mails, and that we have been paying a possible average of $20,000,000 per annum since 1887, payments for services which in France the railroads are required to perform for mere nominal sums, it will be seen that the railroads have been given an indirect Government aid from which farm transportation has been excluded.

THE COST OF THE PRESENT SYSTEM TO FARMERS.

It has been stated that it costs as much to deliver a bushel of grain 5 miles to the railroad in Illinois as it then costs to carry it 1,100 miles to Buffalo. In the tobacco region of West Virginia it costs five times as much to deliver that product 8 miles over mud roads as it then costs to carry it more than 400 miles to Richmond. Estimates have been made which show that it requires ten days' hauling, on an average, for each farmer in the United States to carry his produce to market. The Twelfth Census reported 5,739,756 farms in 1900. Counting one person to the farm engaged in delivering for ten days a year, the time consumed would amount to about 57,000,000 days, which at $3 per day for man and team would require

A French farmer rarely carries his produce to market when he can work in the field. He selects a time for hauling which is too inclement for his work in the field. When it rains or snows or when it is too cold for farm work he loads his wagon for market, and despite rain or snow or cold is able to carry three or four times as much with the same number of horses as the farmer can in Georgia, Iowa, or the average American State. Investigation has shown that the average cost of transporting a ton over a mile of dirt road in the United States is about 25 cents. The consuls of the United States abroad have sent facts from twenty-three points in European countries which show that the cost of carrying a ton over European improved roads is between 10 and 12 cents. It is perfectly fair to assume that, after allowing for all differences in condition in this country, a system of improved roads would reduce the ton mileage to about 12 cents, a saving of about one-half. It has been estimated again that a billion dollars per annum are paid in the United States for dirt-road transportation alone, and an improvement that promises to save half that sum to the farmers is certainly worthy of the most serious consideration. The census of 1900 reports 10,000,000 and more persons engaged on the farms. The saving to each person would amount to about $50 per annum. The average annual farm wages are less than $400 per annum, which would be increased through this saving about 8 per cent. If the number of farms be used in the calculation, the saving would be about $88 per farm, or 20 per cent on an average wage of $440.

These illustrations are pertinent, and may be extended indefinitely, but enough has been shown to warrant the conclusion that our present system of roads increases unnecessarily the burden of expenditure to the farmer, wastes his time and energies, besides making it impossible for him to grasp all the elements of self and home development which our marvelous opportunities and civilization provide.

WHO MAKE THE ORDINARY ROADS?

The construction and improvement of the common roads of the country, the roads over which the initial transportation of our products must to the largest extent be made, the roads over which the necessaries of life and raw materials must pass to sustain the life and promote the health, comfort, and prosperity of the whole people, is a burden which for one hundred years has rested solely on the people of the rural districts. The cities and towns provide their own streets and avenues and are exempt from service or tax as to the rural roads. These roads are to the largest extent made by the farmers themselves under legalized requirements, upon ill-considered plans, and without coordination or purpose or plan. The men are warned out to work the roads under the supervision of an overseer not fitted for the work and without power to enforce the little fitness he may have. Where taxation has been resorted to it has been local, falling upon the farmers or road users, and not general, with the result that where good roads are most needed there the poorest are to be found and vice versa. The States have for one hundred years or more been tinkering with the roads, and in most cases they are in a worse condition to-day than they were before. The States have not proceeded under the requirements of a well-devised plan for a general system of roads and have for the most part been unable to bear the tremendous expense generated by the good-roads movement.

After one hundred years of crazy patchwork we are able to show a system of roads in which 5 per cent are good, 10 per cent fairly passable, and 85 per cent bad, indifferent, execrable, or worse. When Sam Jones said that he could dive off the sidewalk in a certain Western town and go boot-top deep in mud, no one smiled, as that was apparently the ordinary condition of things; but when he added parenthetically the words "head foremost," a roar of laughter followed the statement, and the extravagance of the statement simply emphasized the truthfully horrid condition of many of our roads. Fifteen per cent may be called roads and all the balance mere rights of way.

To build an improved road according to well-devised plans costs from $100 to $400 a mile where sand and clay are used, and from $3,000 to $9,000 per mile for macadamized roads. Under the present system it has been estimated that our dirt roads cost about $12 a mile. It is evident that a system which affords $12 a mile can not be relied on to give roads that cost $400 a mile, much less the better roads costing $3,000 a mile. It is also evident that the States generally working alone can not reasonably be expected to furnish the means to build a general system of macadamized roads, and yet it is to that system that the United States must come if it is to compare in any sense with the enlightened countries of Europe in any system of well-devised roads.

California in twenty years has expended $49,500,000 on 50,000 miles of county roads, but is still a long way from the haven of a complete system of good roads. Connecticut appropriated $225,000 in 1903 to build 450 miles of roads, paying $3,000 a mile for gravel roads and $6,500 per mile for 16-foot macadamized roads. Illinois appropriates $25,000 a year to aid the counties in their improvement of roads. Maryland appropriates $10,000 a year to keep up and improve 16,000 miles of roads. The counties of Maryland maintain about 900 miles of shell, stone, and gravel roads. It is estimated that the counties of this State spend annually for road maintenance about $600,000 and that the people pay in tolls on 497 miles of toll road about $140,000. The average hauling distance in Maryland is 6.7 miles and the average load per horse about one-half a ton. The average cost of hauling a ton 1 mile is 26 cents and the cost of macadamized roads 20-foot wide, macadamized 12 feet, is from $4,000 to $6,000 a mile. In 1904 the legislature of Maryland appropriated $200,000 for the construction of macadamized roads.

Massachusetts appropriates $450,000 per annum for constructing and $60,000 for maintenance. This State has already put $6,000,000 in her roads, and has recently appropriated $2,250,000 more for a five-years expenditure. The 12 to 15 foot stone roads of the State cost about $5,750 a mile, and the gravel roads from $3,000 to $4,000 a mile. Up to October 1, 1905, they had built 615 miles of roads. There are 20,000 miles of road in the State, of which 1,900 will eventually obtain State aid. The great body of the roads in this State will have to be improved locally or go without improvement.

From all these considerations it is evident, to my mind, that the States can not be looked to with any degree of assurance for that aid which will improve the public roads used by the neighborhood farmer. The only hope for an aid that shall be all sufficient and permanent is from the National Government. [Applause.]

THE CONSTITUTIONAL PHASES OF THIS QUESTION.

From 1789 to 1822 Congress appropriated money in aid of internal improvements, principally for the construction of roads and highways. Since 1822 the policy of the Government has been adverse to appropriations for roads, although about $450,000,000 have been appropriated for rivers and harbors, improvements as clearly inhibited by the constitutional provisions and arguments as improvements of the public roads. In 1822 Congress made an appropriation in aid of the Cumberland road, which was vetoed by President Monroe in a message which has been accepted ever since as sound constitutional law and as an authority. An analysis of the appropriating bill and of the message vetoing it does not support the contention that Congress has not the right to appropriate to aid in the construction of public roads, but, on the contrary, expressly warrants such an appropriation. The particular bill vetoed not only appropriated money in aid of the Cumberland road, but went further, very much further, and in this extension beyond the mere appropriation was held to be unconstitutional. The Cumberland road bill of 1822 appropriated money for the construction of the road, not under State auspices, but under national auspices. The right of Congress to appropriate money to the States to be used by the States for building roads was clearly upheld by Monroe, but the right of the National Government to enter upon a general scheme of public improvements for itself, directing them, controlling, and owning them, was denied. This is all there is of the question. Congress, under strict State rights construction, may constitutionally appropriate $25,000,000 a year, to be divided among the States in accordance with some equitable plan, the States being required to use said money for the improvements designated, to own and to maintain them afterwards.

The advocating an appropriation of $25,000,000 per annum by the General Government to the States for the improvement of public roads by the States is not an abandonment of State rights, nor is it in any sense, as has been intimated in influential quarters, "a milestone in the progress of constitutional thinking." Jefferson thought this way; Madison so thought, as did Monroe and Jackson. State rights as a doctrine was clearly upheld by all these men in their every reference to public improvements, and the right of Government to appropriate to the States upheld in the same breath. In advocating this measure of appropriation of the National Government to the public roads no States-rights advocate advances in constitutional thinking, but simply asserts boldly and clearly what the older States-rights leaders made clear in their day. Following is an extract from President Monroe's veto message which is worthy of the careful reading of every man in this body, and which explicitly upholds our constitutional right to appropriate money absolutely to the States for the improvement of the public roads in the States. [Applause.]

On page 167 of volume 2 of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents by Richardson, the following language, being a part of Monroe's great State paper, appears:

> Good roads and canals will promote many very important national purposes. They will facilitate the operations of war, the movements of troops, the transportation of cannons or provisions, and every warlike store, much to our advantage and to the disadvantage of the enemy in time of war. Good roads will facilitate the transportation of the mail, and thereby promote the purposes of commerce and political intelligence among the people. They will, by being properly directed to these objects, enhance the value of our vacant lands, a treasure of vast resource to the nation. To the appropriation of the public money to improvements having these objects in view and carried to a certain extent I do not see any well-founded constitutional objection.

In the same document Monroe laid down the principle by which such an appropriation should be governed while reiterating in strong language the undoubted right. He said:

> That Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense, and of general, not local, national, not State, benefit.

Every States-rights advocate in the land may lawfully advocate the appropriations asked for by either the Latimer or Brownlow bill, without surrendering a single iota of his convictions, for the improvement of the public roads of the entire United States through a system devised for the entire country and carried out by the States themselves is an appropriation of money "for general, not local, purposes; national, not State, benefit."

Jackson, in vetoing the Maysville road bill, very properly held that as the road was entirely in a single State, and the appropriation for a single road that it violated the principle of "general, not local; national, not State, benefit."

President Jackson also suggested, both in his annual address and in the veto message referred to, another method of a constitutional aid to the public roads of the country, and that was a division of the surplus revenue among the several States according to their ratio of representation. A division of the surplus was accordingly made and the constitutionality of the Williams bill, now before us, placed beyond controversy. [Applause.]

Beginning with the early years of the last century, there is an almost uninterrupted succession of acts, reaching down as far as the present generation, appropriating money for the construction of roads—some for military purposes—in the different States, the total of these appropriations running up into many millions of dollars.

By act of March 29, 1806, the construction of the famous Cumberland road, stretching from the Potomac to the Ohio River, was authorized, and from time to time supplementary acts were passed extending the road into Indiana and Illinois, the last appropriation being made by act of May 25, 1838, and the total of appropriations for that road aggregated $6,832,945.05. The total of appropriations by Congress for public roads up to and including 1838, was approximately $17,000,000. From that time to the present road construction on the part of the Government, except such as was done by the War Department for purely military purposes, may be said to have stopped altogether, but from 1893 to the present time small annual appropriations have been made for public-road inquiries and demonstrations, under the direction of the Department of Agriculture, the total of which amounts to $401,000.

It will be of interest to note in this connection that there is a total mileage of all public roads of 2,151,570 (1904), of which 153,662 miles were improved roads, surfaced with gravel or stone or other materials, the total cost on account of them in all the States and Territories being $79,771,417.87.

In my opinion we have an undoubted right to do what is asked for by any one of the three bills now before us, the end of each being the appropriation of about $24,000,000 or $25,000,000 to the States to aid them in the improvement of the dirt roads of the country, this end being reached in two of the bills by direct appropriations and in the other by an apportionment of the surplus revenues among the States in the ratio of their representation.

WHAT THE STATES WOULD RECEIVE.

In each of the bills the paramount idea seems to be that the appropriation or the apportionment shall be in the ratio of representation or population. Estimating the population of the country to be 80,000,000 and the appropriation or apportionment $24,000,000, the sum of $300,000 would be appropriated or apportioned to every million people in a State. Using this ratio, we calculate the following as each State's share, and with it give the area in square miles of each State:

State.	Distributive share.	Square miles.
Alabama	$540,000	52,000

Wyoming	27,000	97,890

These figures show the almost exact distributive share of each State on a basis of $300,000 to 1,000,000 people. A comparison of the amounts received, with the areas of the States receiving them, reveals some remarkable incongruities, and makes it certain that while a division according to the ratio of population is just under one phase of the discussion that it is remarkably unjust upon another. The very States that need aid, States rich in mineral if not agricultural wealth, would receive almost nothing, while other States that have received tremendous sums in the way of river and harbor appropriations and who have relatively small areas, would receive abnormally large sums. It seems to me that if the Government has the right to appropriate money for general purposes that it has the undoubted right to distribute its largess by a method which will enable the smaller and weaker States, with smaller population and larger area and demanding a much larger number of roads, to receive a much larger sum than their ratio of representation or population would permit them to receive. It seems to me also that patriotism demands that the richer and more populous States shall consent to receive a smaller sum than that demanded by the ratio of population, in order that the other States may receive a greater sum. By this means and by this means alone a general system of good roads can be established throughout the country and the general good of the country be most largely conserved.

Being satisfied that this patriotism exists in this body and that it will voice its sentiment in this manner, I submit the general proposition that no State shall receive more than $1,000,000 per annum and that no State shall receive less than either $300,000 or $400,000 per annum. I have calculated the expenditure upon each of these bases and find that in neither case will the requirement be more than $25,000,000 per annum.

Let us do this, do it now, and do it continuously for thirty years, and the problem of good roads will be solved for all time to come.

In conclusion, I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks a copy of the bill which I have introduced and which has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

A bill (H. R. 16988) to establish in the Department of Agriculture a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Public Highways, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in the Department of Agriculture a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Public Highways.

SEC. 2. That the object and purpose of said Bureau shall be to cooperate with the various States and Territories of the United States in the construction and improvement of permanent public roads according to the provisions of this act; to make investigations and experiments in regard to the best methods of road making and the best road-making materials; to cooperate with the various States and Territories of the United States in the construction of object-lesson roads; to publish and distribute bulletins and reports on the subject of roads and road improvement; to bring about, as far as may be, a uniform system for the repair, improvement, and construction of the public roads throughout the United States.

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a chief of said Bureau of Public Highways, to be known and designated as Director of Highways, who shall be selected with a view to his practical knowledge of the construction of highways and whose salary shall be $——— a year. The President shall detail from the Engineer Corps of the Army an officer not below the rank of captain, who shall act as assistant to the Director of Highways, and the said Director shall be authorized to appoint, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, such inspectors, clerks, and messengers as may be necessary for the proper transaction of the business of the said Bureau, and the amount required to pay the salaries of the Director and of the said office force, and also the necessary contingent expenses of the said Bureau for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for the year ending June 30, 1909, are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the said Director of Highways shall be under the general supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall exercise general jurisdiction over all matters and acts coming under the control of the said Director by virtue of this enactment.

SEC. 4. That after the expiration of six months from the date of the approval of this act any State or Territory or civil subdivision thereof, through the proper officers having jurisdiction of the public roads, may apply for aid in the improvement or construction of the public roads or sections thereof located in said State or Territory.

SEC. 5. That the said Director of Highways shall make and promulgate all needful rules and regulations under which the various States and Territories or civil subdivisions thereof may apply for and receive the benefits of this act. The said rules and regulations shall be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 6. That no State or Territory or civil subdivision thereof shall be entitled to receive the benefits of this act until it shall have established, to the satisfaction of the said Director of Highways: First, that the highway, or section thereof, sought to be improved or constructed is of sufficient public importance to come within the purview of this act, taking into account the use, location, and value of such highway, or section thereof, for the purposes of common traffic and travel and for the delivery of the mail of the United States; second, that the requisite right of way for the improvement and construction of the highway, or section thereof, has been secured; third, that the highway, or section thereof, when constructed or improved will be maintained and kept in repair without recourse upon the United States; fourth, that the State or Territory or civil subdivision thereof has provided for the payment of its portion of the total cost of the improvement or construction as provided for in this act.

SEC. 7. That one-half of the expense of the improvement or construction of any public highway of any State or Territory or civil subdivision thereof that may receive the benefits of this act shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Agriculture issued upon the requisition of said Director of Highways, out of any specific appropriation made to carry out the provisions of this act, and that one-half of the expense thereof shall be paid by the State or Territory or civil subdivision thereof in which the highway or section thereof is located: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the said State or Territory or civil subdivision thereof from receiving credit for labor, material, and machinery used in the construction or improvements of said highway or section thereof: Provided further, That no money shall be advanced by the United States in payment of its proportion of the expense of the improvement or construction as herein provided for, except as the work of actual construction progresses, and in no case shall the payment or payments made prior to the completion of the work be in excess of 80 per cent of the value of the work actually performed.

SEC. 8. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000,000, to be disbursed in five annual installments of $20,000,000 each, as hereinafter directed, the first of said annual installments to be available in and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909: Provided, That any part of such annual installment not expended during the then current fiscal year shall not be covered back into the Treasury, but shall be available for the work to be carried on in and for the fiscal year next thereafter succeeding.

SEC. 9. That the sum of $20,000,000 hereby appropriated for each of the fiscal years next succeeding after the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, shall be apportioned among the States and Territories of the United States in the proportion which the population of each State and Territory bears to the total population of the United Sates: Provided, however, That no State or Territory shall receive in each year an amount larger than $1,000,000 nor less than $250,000.

SEC. 10. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and they hereby are, repealed.

I am of the opinion that the subject of good roads is to-day the most important before the American people. It is a subject which has been sadly neglected by our National Legislative bodies, but the time is at hand when we must seriously consider this question and legislate along the lines suggested in the foregoing bill, or else we must and will be called to account by the millions of interested and anxious people throughout the length and breadth of our land. The great mass of agricultural people of our country are beginning to realize that they are being discriminated against when year after year we appropriate millions upon millions for rivers and harbors, for transportation and commerce, which are in nowise more important than the initial transportation, which is so great a burden to the farmers in all sections of the United States. We can not afford and must not neglect such a vitally important matter, but let us get together as one man and build good roads for 80,000,000 of waiting people who make this the greatest country in all the earth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. WILLETT. Mr. Chairman, during my absence for a few moments this afternoon I have learned that one of the Members of this House, a colleague of mine, made a few remarks in which he referred to me personally.

Now, so far as any remarks I have made on the floor of this House are concerned, there is not a word I have uttered that I am not willing to defend and combat against any assault; and particularly is this true of anything that my belligerent Quaker colleague may say regarding my utterances upon this floor in the past. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As I read his remarks, that have been handed me by the reporters, I see an evident purpose of concealing from the mind and thought of his hearers the real man he was talking about. Now, I think it can be fairly said concerning me that in anything I have said on the floor of this House there has been no purpose on my part to conceal the person of whom I spoke. When my colleague from New York [Mr. SULZER] insisted upon knowing against whom it was Mr. COCKS was directing his remarks, then it disclosed this colloquy:

I am referring to a gentleman who is a constituent of mine and a resident of my district.

Mr. SULZER. Let us have his name.

Mr. COCKS of New York. He represents the Fourteenth District of New York.

Mr. SULZER. Tell his name.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. WILLETT, I think, is his name.

[Laughter.]

If there is any name ever indelibly impressed upon the mind of Mr. COCKS, I think it is the name of WILLETT. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I had the honor of running against this gentleman in a Republican district normally 15,000. I took the standard of Democracy and went up and down that district advocating the principles of the Democracy, and if you had seen the coat tails of my belligerent friend as he followed me up and down you would have been astonished at the agility with which he traveled. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COCKS of New York. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Will the gentleman please indicate at what election was it that there was a 15,000 majority?

Mr. WILLETT. I say that the district normally had a 15,000 majority.

Mr. COCKS of New York. I assume we never had a normal vote in that district.

Mr. WILLETT. You never drew the Republican normal majority. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKS of New York. What candidate ever did receive it?

Mr. WILLETT. I am talking now about my colleague [Mr. COCKS].

Mr. SULZER. Governor Morton, when he ran for governor.

Mr. COCKS of New York. What did he carry the district by?

Mr. SULZER. By over 15,000.

Mr. WILLETT. Now, the great complaint that has been made concerning my remarks which have been addressed to the occupant of the White House has been that that poor, weak, insufficient little man has been unable to answer back, and therefore my attack has been unfair. Now, if there has ever been a man who held a public official position in the United States who insisted upon answering back, and who could answer back, it has been the man who is in the White House to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] My friend [Mr. COCKS] has said he would be delighted to run against me again in that district upon the platform I have enunciated in the few remarks I have made. If the letters of commendation that have come from one end of his Congressional district to the other—and I am speaking now of his district—are any indication of the temper and mind and heart of the people of his district he is greatly in error concerning the wishes of the voters of that district and the principles to which they are adhering at this minute. Telegrams and letters of high commendation have come to me, and I have yet to receive the first letter from any resident or constituent of the First Congressional District which disagrees with me. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If it were not that it might indicate egotism on my part, I should be delighted to spread upon the record hundreds of letters which have been received from voters of the First District commending me for the remarks I have made. Why? Because they feel as my constituent from the First District does not feel; because they know, as he does not know, that the needs of the people at this minute are demanding relief. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I hold in my hand here letters I have received this morning from about fifteen labor unions, indicating that from 75 to 80 per cent of their members are out of work and are needing bread, and therefore they are pleading with me, as a Member of this House, to do what I can to assist them in this time of need. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman says if he thought what I have said in the way of criticism of the President would have any effect upon him or in any way detract from his popularity or in any way influence him, he would extend his remarks further. Why, of course anything that I say will not influence him. Anything that the Constitution of the United States says does not influence him. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Anything that millions of needy people of this land to-day are saying does not influence him. [Applause on the Democratic side.] "My policies" are the stream flowing from his lips and his never-ceasing tongue. "My policies for my people" are his declarations, and they must be accepted by us. I have been surprised, I will tell you frankly, and I have not hesitated to express my views in emphatic terms.

I have been in close touch with the throbbing hearts of needy people, as I have gone back to my district. I have met them by hundreds, and they have urged me to do something, but as I have looked at the majority side of this House, the side in whose hands are the reins of government, the side in whose hands is the weapon that can strike down the demon that is destroying us, and as I have seen the impotency and the absolute cowardice there, I have gone back to them and said: "There is no hope in our present Government, except to send to the halls of the House of Representatives men who are throbbing with the impulses of true Democracy, and I will pledge my life that we will give you relief." [Applause on the Democratic side.] When the man who represents the district from which the President of the United States comes stands on this floor and says he has nothing to say in defense of the President, after the usurpations of that office, after the cowardice on the tariff, and a multitude of other things which he has exhibited, after the impotency of his own party, when he says he has nothing to say, it is a startling exhibition of unpatriotic representation in this mighty Hall. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, if you wanted to put through any legislation that would be helpful to the American people, you could do it in a day. You have the power, you have the machinery, you have all the influences that go to carry a complete and perfect consummation anything that you desire to accomplish. Why do you not do it? You do not dare to do it. You are cowards in the face of the American people to-day because you are on the threshold of a national election. Why do you not step to the forefront, unfurl God's great banner that is given to us as a free people, break off the shackles of these mighty trusts that have bound you in fetters of iron for years, and say: "The people shall be our people, and we will help them in the true spirit and letter of the law!" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ELLERBE. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the soil survey and investigation work as conducted by the Bureau of Soils in the Agricultural Department. This work, in my opinion, is not appreciated as it should be; and I sincerely trust the appropriation will be increased. Let us see what is being done by this Bureau.

The scope of the work of the Bureau of Soils as outlined in the official report of the Chief, June 30, 1894, in part is as follows:

> One of the most important objects of the work of the Division should be to investigate and map the important soil areas in accordance with their geological relations and their agricultural value. These maps should be of such a character as to show the farmers or prospective settlers the character of the soil and the nature of the crops or the general classes of crops adapted to the general soil formations of the different regions. The soils adapted to the certain classes of crops should also be thoroughly investigated and mapped so that one could see by consulting the maps the areas adapted to certain classes of tobacco, truck, or horticultural interests. Such work forms an essentially new line of agricultural geology and requires for its successful prosecution persons trained in the difficult problems of surface geology and who have a broad appreciation and knowledge of the relation of soils to crops.
> There are still large areas of land along the Atlantic coast and in other parts of the country lying out as waste lands which are adapted to the raising of early truck crops. There are large areas of land in many of our States, well adapted to the production of different classes of tobacco and to other agricultural and horticultural crops, which are not at present used to the best advantage because the relations of the soils to crops are not fully understood or appreciated.

The importance of this work has been so manifest to agriculturists throughout the United States that at the present time there are over 400 requests for soil surveys on file, and it is not possible to make as many surveys each year as there are recorded new requests for surveys. Such is the status of the work, when it has only been possible to map 10 per cent of the total area of lands held in farms in the United States, and requests for the work are coming in in a constantly increasing ratio. Some of the reasons for the necessity and demand for this work follow:

The soil survey constitutes an expert opinion of the character of the soils in each community and of the class of crops which can be raised to best advantage and of the methods of cultivation and fertilization which are most certain to produce good crop yields.

The soil surveys are used by agricultural colleges as a basis for further experimentation and demonstration, as a basis for instruction in soil science, and as a basis for advising farmers in planting and caring for crops.

They are used by individuals in search of investments and homes; by companies and individuals having lands for sale; by individuals, communities, and public officials in directing immigration, and by investment companies in placing loans.

In 1901 the Secretary of Agriculture, in his report, further defined the work of the Bureau of Soils, as follows:

> The Bureau of Soils is charged with the study of soil problems in their relation to practical agriculture; with the investigation of the physical and chemical properties of soils and of the materials and methods involved in artificial fertilization and its influence upon the original soils; with the classification and mapping of soils in agricultural districts to show the distribution of the various soil types, with a view to determining their adaptability to certain crops, and their management and treatment; with the investigation of alkali problems and their relations to irrigation and seepage waters, the causes of the rise and accumulation of alkali, and the reclamation of injured or abandoned lands.

To assist in solving the many field problems which are met the laboratories investigate the distribution and movements of moisture in soils; the solubility of mineral matter in soil moisture, the chemistry of the various alkali salts, the mechanical distribution of mineral plant foods in the soil moisture, the nature and physical chemistry relationships of the organic constituents of soils, and also devise methods and apparatus for the physical and chemical study of soils. A study is also being made of the effect of the size of the mineral soil particles upon the rate of solution.

To determine the treatment necessary for each type of soil, if it is to be used to produce the best results, the manurial requirements have been worked out for many soils. The manurial and fertilizer requirements of the principal soil types encountered during the progress of the soil survey are tested. In the past the character of fertilizer best suited to the needs of any soil could only be determined by long years of field experiment. By means of tests it is now possible to indicate in many cases what form of manure or fertilizer is required by different soils under different crop and climatic conditions. This would save millions formerly lost by an unwise use of fertilizers.

This testing of manurial and fertilizer requirements will be continued on all the principal types and classes of soils in the regions where the use of fertilizers or manure is common or is being introduced. In this way the soil-survey reports will not only deal with the appropriate selection of characteristic soils for the production of different farm crops, but will also indicate the proper procedure whereby increased yields of the staple crops may be secured. These two problems—adaptation of soil to crop and the maintenance and increase of crop yields—constitute the great agricultural problems of the country.

A circular has been prepared to meet the many requests received by the Bureau of Soils for detailed information concerning the wire-basket method for determining the manurial requirements of soils. The method consists in growing plants in small wire pots containing soil to which fertilizers of different kinds and in varying quantities have been added.

It should be borne in mind that this is a method not for a study of the requirements of plants, but for the fertilizer requirements of soils in which the plants are used as an indicator.

This is distinctly a soil problem, because it can not be intelligently worked out except as relating to soil study itself. The failure of all others to successfully solve these problems is simply the history of ignoring or paying little attention to the soil factor, because they do not know how to cope with it, although a matter of primary importance.

The Secretary, in his report to the President February 1, 1900, states as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to transmit a report of this Department upon the field operations of the Division of Soils during the year 1899. It covers not only the most important work of this Division, but is, in my opinion, regarded in the light of the possible results of the information which has been secured thereby, the most important work of this character ever undertaken in any country.

Undoubtedly the most pressing demands for a soil survey arise from a consideration of special problems. It may be for the consideration of industries which could be introduced into a section of the country where, from the increased competition and the opening up of new areas, the specialization of crops at present grown in the area, or from various social problems, the industries have languished and new industries or new methods are desired to build up the locality. A very important consideration, however, lies in the introduction and spread of new industries, in the improvement and development of the different types of tobacco, of fruit production, of truck growing, of sugar beets, and of other special crops; also in the improvement of certain soil areas by the use of fertilizers, by the introduction of underdrainage, and in the West by the protection of soils against seepage waters and alkali and the reclamation of lands already injured by these causes. The alkali problem is already well in hand. The influence of the soil upon the production of early truck and upon the production of different types of tobacco has also been pointed out in previous publications of the Division. The recent successful growing of Sumatra tobacco on a certain soil in the Connecticut Valley is a very striking instance of the possibility growing out of the detailed soil survey in any given locality.

It may thus be seen that—

The soil is fundamental in its uses. For these reasons the study of the soil must always occupy a fundamental position in the development of the resources of the United States and in the arrangement of its economic conditions. Only within recent years has the great variety which actually exists in the soil resources of the United States been understood. Beginning in 1899 the soil survey of the Bureau of Soils has been engaged in the classification of soils, in the representation, upon soil maps, of the occurrence of the various types discovered, and in the preparation of reports which describe the characteristics and the uses of the different soils encountered. Since the beginning of this work in 1899 approximately 100,000 square miles of the agricultural regions of the United States have been surveyed. Nearly 600 different types of soil have been encountered, and special studies have been made not only of the soils adapted to the growing of the cereal crops, but also of those special-purpose soils which have a high value for the production of fruit of various kinds, of truck, of market-garden crops, of different varieties of tobacco, of sugar beets, and of many newly introduced crops.

Studies along the Atlantic seaboard have demonstrated that the Norfolk sand, Norfolk fine sand, and the Norfolk fine sandy loam are peculiarly adapted to the production of those early vegetables and fruits which furnish the supply for the Northern city markets. It has also been shown in this connection that where transportation is adequate land belonging to these three soil types which formerly had a value of $5 an acre can readily be made to have a value of from $100 to $200 an acre for the production of the truck crops.

The recent importance of the rice industry in Louisiana and Texas has led to investigations of the soils best adapted for growing this crop. It has been found that in general the heavy silt loams and clay loams of the Louisiana and Texas seacoast prairies are well adapted to rice production, and it has been upon soils of this character that the wonderful strides in rice production have been made possible.

Another problem, fundamental and broad in scope, of great present use, and destined to be of the greatest importance in agriculture and to the scientific world, is brought out in the relation of the work to the experiment stations:

The people of the United States are provided in each State and Territory with at least one agricultural college and experiment station where scientific research along agricultural lines is carried on and where information is imparted to the younger members of the community. A vast amount of scientific agricultural work has been accomplished by these colleges and experiment stations. In the nature of the case, however, it is frequently impossible for the agricultural experiments to be conducted at more than one or two places within the State. Experiments conducted in a limited area and upon a few soil types are occasionally not of general application throughout the State whose interests are to be served. In order that these experiment stations may be made of the most direct application to each farming community within the State served, it is necessary for the farmer to know not only the details of any particular experiment, but also for him to be able to judge whether his own farm contains the types of soil upon which the experiment has been carried on and whether it lies within the same general climatic belt as the experiment station itself. If he can be assured of these two facts, it is then possible for him to derive the greatest benefit from the results of any particular experiment. If he can not be assured of these facts, it remains for him to discover whether the conditions under which he is working are the same as those which are found at the experiment station. The soil survey is thus seen to serve not only a local purpose of this kind, but through its general classification of the soils of extensive regions it has frequently occurred that the results secured at a given experiment station become applicable not only with the limits of that State, but are also found to be applicable in other adjoining States, or throughout a considerable region. It thus renders the results of experiments conducted at the various experiment stations applicable throughout a wide range of territory not restricted by State lines.

In the same way extensive studies throughout the Eastern and Northeastern States have shown that many of the so-called "worn-out soils" are not failing to produce satisfactory crops because of any essential deficiency, but that the occasional low producing power of certain areas is due to unwise systems of cropping and of crop rotation and to a failure properly to adapt the crop to the soil and to the climate. The production of cereal crops upon these soils was still essential under agricultural conditions existing from thirty to fifty years ago. Under more recent agricultural conditions now prevailing in the United States, particularly those giving rise to the extensive production of cereal crops upon the prairie lands of the Central and Northwestern States, grain production is no longer profitable in many of the older States.

But of chief importance and value in the aggregate is the information sought by farmers concerning the adaptation of the 400 different kinds of soils already investigated by the Bureau. The development of the country has brought a keen competition between growers in different sections of the country, and in such cases the growers have found that the character of the soil is one of the primary and most essential factors to be considered in the economy of production and that he who has the natural advantage in this respect has little to fear from his competitors, because he is using the soil peculiarly adapted to that crop—an advantage which others of his region seek to overcome by an increased expenditure for fertilizer, cultivation, or both.

But the soils with which they are so vainly striving to succeed may be superior for the production of some other crop, and if they could only understand to what crop the soils they have are best adapted they could thus put them to their most economic use and be as successful financially as the man who already has complete information in regard to the adaptation of his soil to its particular crop. Just as fast as farmers realize this, and at the present time they are doing so by leaps and bounds, by so much are the demands on the Bureau increased. It is the fundamental information about soil adaptation to crops that is so eagerly sought, and it is utterly impossible with present facilities to help more than a small percentage of the applicants. In just the same way it is found that in many areas the crops at present grown in part are not suited to the conditions as well as some other crops might be and that the introduction of some crop new to the locality, which is well adapted to a certain soil type there, might so fit into the plan of farming as to add much to the possibilities of financial success.

It is not feasible, however, to try those new crops unless the soils they are adapted thereto are understood, because hit-or-miss trials are most disastrous, and consequently too expensive to be indulged in. So generally is this recognized that the agriculture of each section remains much as it has been for a long time, whereas if the soil adaptations are worked out in accordance with the plan of the Bureau of Soils the new crop is tried at once upon the soil to which it is adapted. No risks are run, no losses encountered, and financial success is assured. [Applause.]

Such was the work on the tobacco soils and to such extent with the tobacco problems that soils are now chosen by the growers in the leading tobacco districts of the United States, and favorable results are certain from the start, and the industry has been placed on a very permanent and profitable basis.

As another illustration it is found that not only are the different types of soil of widely different value for growing cotton, but also that the different varieties of cotton require different soils for their most profitable growth, and that the working out of the soil preferences for each of the many varieties of this crop is a most necessary, and entirely possible, problem, the solution of which would save the Southern planters hundreds of thousands of dollars each year. Sufficient progress has now been made in soil studies, to be certain that many of our crops are not only grown to the best advantage on certain classes of soils, but that the different varieties thereof are very definite in their soil preferences or requirements.

In my own district there are thousands of acres of land planted to cotton and producing $10 to $15 per acre, that could, if devoted to other crops, produce from $100 to $500 per acre. Some men have been pioneers in this great work and deserve the "Well done," of every man who delights in the prosperity of his country.

McIver Williamson, of Darlington County, S. C,. has revolutionized corn-growing in my State and proven that with proper selection, preparation, fertilization, and cultivation of soil from 75 to 150 bushels of corn can be grown per acre instead of 10 to 15 bushels, as formerly.

Captain Drake, of Marlboro County, some years ago contested for the prize of $500 offered by Orange Judd Publishing Company for the most corn grown on 1 acre. This was open to every State in the Union. He opened the eyes of the people of this country when he grew 254 bushels and 50 pounds of corn on a measured acre of Marlboro land.

Some years ago the managers of the Raleigh and Charleston Railroad, in their efforts to develop the country through which their road ran, sent a man to Marion, S. C., who sold one crop of lettuce from a single acre of Marion soil for more than $1,800.

Captain Westbrook, of North Carolina, made $23,000 above expenses on 20 acres of land, considered by many to be of little value. Strawberries were grown entirely.

Some years ago the News and Courier, of Charleston, S. C., began urging the people of our State to plant tobacco. After a while a few were persuaded to try it. Now my district is the great tobacco section of South Carolina, with warehouses in five towns in my county. One town, Mullins, sells from seven to twelve million pounds of tobacco each year. With this crop men have canceled mortgages on their farms, improved their homes, and are filling our schools and colleges with their sons and daughters.

If individuals can do this working alone, what could this Bureau of Soils do if we would but give them ample funds to employ trained and skilled experts to do this work?

For three years I have endeavored to have this work done in my district. Each time I am told, "The funds are exhausted."

We can appropriate millions for the Army and millions for the Navy, but, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to appropriating the small sum of eleven millions for the great agricultural interests of the country we falter—afraid. I am not opposed to a reasonable Army. Neither am I opposed to a Navy sufficiently strong to defend the exposed cities of our country. But, Mr. Chairman, if we could cover both oceans with the finest warships in the world and have them manned with the most expert gunners on earth, it could not continue the prosperity of this country if the cotton crop, the wheat crop, and the tobacco crop were a failure.

Mr. Chairman, the men who toil in the sunshine and in the rain, in the heat and in the cold—facing difficulties appreciated by few of us—to grow the cotton that clothes the world and the wheat that feeds the world, are, in deed and in truth, American heroes. Some day the American Congress will appreciate their worth and deal with them in a more liberal way. [Loud applause.]

SOIL EXHAUSTION—ITS AVOIDANCE SOUGHT BY GOVERNMENT SURVEY.

WASHINGTON, December 29, 1907.

The greatest fear of the American soil tillers—exhaustion and unproductiveness of land—is rapidly being dispelled by the experiments and investigations of the Bureau of Soils here. This branch of the Department of Agriculture has received little advertising; it does its work quietly and the cities hear little of it, but to the great and small farming districts, to the hesitating planter, and to the dependent settler it is a great boon and a daily counsellor. It has shown the way to scientific farming, it has made briar patches into grassy, fertile plains, swamps into blooming cornfields, sandy prairies into acres of production. In short, a man can learn in an hour from the Bureau of Soils what his father spent years in ascertaining, and he can learn it with greater accuracy. From a map or a report he can see what crop his land will best produce, what it will not yield, and, perhaps, that it will bring him undreamed of produce and wealth. The Bureau of Soils has made many farmers rich, and the number that make use of the Bureau is increasing daily.

Its possibilities seem unlimited; its results at present are extraordinary, but its scope is of necessity limited because of a lack of funds with which to carry on the work completely and comprehensively. The authorities of the Bureau, under the direction of Prof. Milton Whitney, have asked for $500,000 for the fiscal year 1909, and they have some assurances that this amount will be appropriated by Congress. Representatives who have studied the workings of the Bureau and who have satisfied themselves of its utility say that half a million is insufficient, and that the tremendous advantages it is working to the country, both monetary and otherwise, warrant a much larger expenditure. The authorities of the Bureau, however, have been wisely modest in their request, and are daily engaged in explaining the work of the institution to all who are interested. What will be accomplished with the $500,000, if it is granted, can best be gauged by a consideration of what has been done with the $200,000 spent in 1907.

In the main, the Bureau of Soils devotes a large portion of its attention to surveying, mapping, and classifying the land of the United States and determining the constituents of soil in such a precise manner that a farmer wishing to plant a certain crop can determine in advance the advisability of such a course by a moment's reference to the report of the Bureau. Irrigation and its success must be largely credited to this Department. Reclamation owes its inception to the Bureau; fertilization and erosion are studied in their most technical phases and reported in simple language, while the transplanting of seed and the adaptability of soil complete the main uses of the Bureau.

The maps issued are used not only by farmers and agriculturists but by landowners of all classes, including real estate and railroad men. From every part of the country come requests asking that particular portions of land be surveyed; thousands of maps and reports are asked for, and many letters of appreciation and thanks are on file at the Bureau. To chart every necessary portion of land in the country is the ultimate aim, but at present the Bureau is ten years behind, even in those regions where a survey will mean a certain and immediate increase in the value of soil. More than 40,000 requests come to the Bureau in a year from struggling farmers, from cattle raisers, from important chambers of commerce, from boards of trade, and from various State departments of agriculture and geological surveys. Several States have cooperated with the Bureau to a considerable extent, Alabama having given $10,000 for this purpose and, it is said, has received thousands in return. Only a small proportion of the requests can be complied with, as the force of surveyors is small. A systematic plan is being followed out, which in the course of time will give satisfaction to all regions, and which an increased appropriation would greatly facilitate.

Mr. LAMB. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, by the courtesy of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] I shall take advantage of this opportunity to say a few words reganding a matter that I deem of importance to the city of Washington, to the country generally, and especially of sufficient gravity from every point of view to command the immediate attention and consideration of every Member of this Congress. Some time ago legislation was enacted providing that a suitable memorial be erected in the city of Washington to commemorate the memory and achievements of General Grant. No one in all this land is more in favor of erecting an enduring monument in the capital city of the nation to the great military chieftain of the civil war than I am. It is fitting and proper that it should be done, and I want to see it done. The Government owes General Grant a debt that can never be paid. So long as the Government shall endure his glory will be sung in song and in story.

But, sir, the question now is, Where should this memorial be located? The Commission delegated to locate the site for the monument selected, in the first instance, a site in the Ellipse immediately in front of the White House—between the White House and the Washington Monument. That site, in my judgment, was a very proper location and in all respects most suitable. Afterwards, for some reason or other, the Commission abandoned that site and selected the Botanic Garden as the proper place. In my opinion, that change was most unwise and the gravest kind of a mistake. The Botanic Garden for a great many years has been one of the historic landmarks of the District of Columbia, and under the guiding genius of its eminent director, William R. Smith, it has been useful, as well as ornamental. Thousands and thousands of people coming to this city every year visit the Botanic Garden and enjoy its many beauties. It is one of the pleasure resorts of Washington, especially to every man, woman, and child that loves flowers and trees and plants and shrubs.

It is a monument to the energy of Mr. Smith, and no part of it should be desecrated or destroyed. For years trees have been planted in this garden by the most distinguished citizens of our country, and by eminent citizens of other countries, so that to-day it is one of the most interesting and beautiful places for visitors in all the city of Washington. Every spot in it is reminiscent and historical. No part of it should be injured or destroyed, and it is the most unsuitable place that could be selected for a great monument to a military hero. The place selected in the Botanic Garden by the Commission for this Grant Memorial is near the street toward this end. Already excavations have begun and the work of destruction will go on unless we stop it. Anyone who will take the time to visit the Botanic Garden will see at a glance how inappropriate the place is for a memorial, and how its erection there will necessitate the lasting injury and destruction of a large number of valuable and beautiful and historic trees—especially one great beautiful tree planted by John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, in 1862, from an acorn which he brought from that famous Commonwealth to commemorate his untiring efforts in endeavoring to bring about peace and stop the deadly conflict between the North and the South.

That tree is one of the most magnificent in all the garden, and is known as the "Crittenden peace tree." Its destruction now would be a shame—a piece of vandalism. That little acorn, planted by the patriotic hand of Senator Crittenden, has grown into a great oak, one of the finest trees in the garden. That tree is an historic landmark and should be sacred from vandal hands. That little acorn—planted there in 1862—to commemorate an heroic effort for peace, to-day, in this great oak tree, exemplifies that peace in its fullest sense, and it would be a desecration—a lamentable desecration—to destroy it. If the monument goes up the tree must be cut down. It can not be saved by removal. According to the judgment of experts who have investigated the matter and who know the most about the subject, it is impossible to dig up so big and so old a tree and transplant it, or to dig up and transplant any of these great and beautiful trees that must be destroyed to make way for the monument. If they are transplanted they will surely die. If the monument work goes ahead these historic trees will be lost.

I am opposed to cutting down these famous trees and destroying one of the chief beauties of the Botanic Garden. It ought not to be done. Congress should stop it, and stop it at once. As I said, I do not believe this site is the best place in Washington for the Grant Monument. It is an out-of-the-way and an obscure place. If erected there, it can not be seen from the Avenue, and this magnificent Grant Memorial should be in a place with sufficient space around it so that it can be seen from all sides and from all directions. The selection of this site in the Botanic Garden is a mistake, and the Commission selecting it should be condemned by a resolution of Congress, and hereafter we should be more careful in appointing men on commissions to select sites for monuments in this city.

The most suitable site in Washington for the Grant Memorial is the first site selected, in the Ellipse between the White House and the Monument. That was General Grant's park. He laid it out, and spent much of his leisure there during the time he was in the White House. Beyond a doubt it is the most suitable and the most appropriate place in Washington for this monument, and the Congress should see to it that it is erected there and kept out of the Botanic Garden.

Now, I want to say that I am in sympathy with those who desire to make Washington the "City Beautiful." I believe it is such to-day, and destined to grow more so as the years come and go. Every citizen in the land should be interested in making the capital of his country the most beautiful city in the world; but we can never do it with commissions composed of men such as we have appointed heretofore. In the future we should select men who know something about art and trees and perspective, and less about law and science and statistics. I am a friend of William R. Smith, the Director of the Botanic Garden—a truly great man; a man who has done a great work for all the people, a world-wide work for this country; a man who has done more in two generations than any other man in all this land to foster and inculcate the love of the beautiful, the love of art, the love of trees and shrubs and plants and flowers; a man who has studied the soil, who has made its arid wastes blossom like a rose, who has cultivated and propagated in the Botanic Garden all kinds of plant life and distributed them to all parts of the country, to grow and blossom and thrive; a man who has made two blades of grass grow where one grew before; a great botanist, a great scientist, a great worker, a thinker—a philosopher, a great horticulturist, a great landscape gardener, a lover of the beautiful in nature; a man who long ago, before Burbank or any other man in this country, experimented with the possibilties of our soil in different parts of the country in order to find out for what it was best adapted and what it would best produce, and, finding it out, worked wonders in every section of this country. I am a friend of this great Scotchman, and I say, and I think we should give heed to his protest against this desecration of the Botanic Garden that he loves so much, that has been in his charge for so many years, and through the agency of which he has done so much to beautify this city and render such inestimable service to every part of the country. We should listen to his protest and save the trees. They can never be transplanted. They can never grow again. Cut them down now and they are gone forever, with all their wealth of beauty and of historical memories.

William R. Smith loves these grand old trees. Let us save them. Let us give heed to his protest and stop the desecration of the Botanic Garden ere it is too late by taking immediate action to prevent the destruction of its trees and finding a more suitable place and a more appropriate site for the Grant Memorial.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is always a great pleasure to me when I can agree with my distinguished friend from New York. I will not undertake to say who originated the idea, but some time ago I introduced in the House a joint resolution changing the location of the Grant Memorial from the place in the Botanic Garden and putting it up on the ellipse which the gentleman is now advocating. On yesterday, however, the fond hopes which I hitherto had had raised in my soul that the resolution might receive a favorable consideration were dashed to the ground by the fact that the gentleman from Georgia, a Democratic Member of the House, and a very distinguished one [Mr. HOWARD], reported from the Committee on the Library that resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it lie upon the table, and there it lies, I suppose never to rise again. And I am sorry to say that the efforts of the distinguished gentleman from New York and myself, both combined or separate, have been unavailing to secure to Mr. Smith, who is entitled, in my judgment, to better treatment, the removal of the Grant Memorial to a place better suited to it than the Botanic Garden and leave the Botanic Garden, as it ought to be left, to botanic garden purposes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Committee, I heard for the past two days the agricultural bill, carrying some eleven millions and odd hundred thousand dollars for the benefit of agriculture, discussed pro and con. This has been a matter of deep interest to me, coming from an agricultural State and coming from the newest State in this entire Union, but I seize these few minutes allotted me to take up another matter that is a local one, but, indeed, a very important one. For the past ten or twelve years the question of admissibility into the Union has been an all-absorbing topic in what was then the Territory of Oklahoma, but now the State of Oklahoma. After the admission of that Territory into the Union we then began to look to our local conditions and matters of local interest. We found that the eastern half of the State, which was then the Indian Territory, now a part of Oklahoma, comprises about 19,000,000 acres of land, and we found that 16,000,000 acres of the 19,000,000 acres was not subject to taxation, was not subject to alienation, was not subject to incumbrance, but was tied up for all purposes. These lands belong, by allotment and their apportionment, to 101,000 Indians. These Indians are known as the "Five Civilized Tribes," and for the hasty presentation that I want to make I desire to divide them into four different classes. The first is that of freedmen, or the negro; second, the intermarried white; third, the mixed blood, and fourth, the full blood. Just a moment, by way of explanation, as to what these four classes embrace. Intermarried citizens are the white citizens who have intermarried into some one of these tribes. The freedman is the negro who was originally a slave to some one of these Indian tribes, but who was long ago emancipated—I might say, more than fifty years ago. The mixed blood, you may well draw your own conclusions, are Indians who have mixed with white blood and the degree of blood is shown upon the official roll in the Interior Department. It might be interesting to know just how these different classes are numbered and what proportion they bear to the whole 101,000. Of full bloods there are 24,669; of mixed blood, 50,670; of intermarried, 2,506; of freedmen, 23,382.

Mr. GARRETT. That is the whole State.

Mr. FERRIS. That comprises the eastern half of the State and comprises what is known as the "Five Civilized Tribes." I want to say that the Five Civilized Tribes stand, as far as the Indian situation is concerned, separate and apart and alone from any other Indian of the State. Half of my Congressional district is in old Oklahoma and half in the Indian Territory. On the Oklahoma side we have Indians that are Indians in the true sense of the word. They are Indians that are Indians, many of whom are not competent to contract, not now entitled to have the restrictions off from the sale of their land, but the Indians on the Indian Territory side I contend, and I believe it is almost the entire belief of the citizenship of my State, should have the restrictions removed for the good of the Indian and for the good of the white citizen and for the progress and development of the State.

Before the State was admitted, and after it was admitted, and during the election, and the formation of the constitution, the question of removal of restrictions, as we call it—in short, to let them enjoy their property rights as other citizens—was debated at length. And on this I wish to say that there never was among the Indians or among the whites in Oklahoma a belief other than the fact that they should be hurriedly removed, all excepting the full bloods. Immediately after the Oklahoma delegation came to Congress, five in the House and two in the Senate, we began to take up the matter with the Indian Office and the Secretary of the Interior. We recognized in them a long experience with Indians, we recognized that they knew much about the local situation, we were anxious to work in conjunction with them, anxious to accomplish all we could side by side with them. They were courteous to us, and we were eager to work with them. Day after day we met and talked over the question of Indian restrictions. Meeting after meeting we had and talked over that question.

I had ideas, other members of the delegation had ideas, the Secretary had ideas, the Indian Office had ideas, and their attorneys had ideas, but finally we got our ideas all together and introduced a bill that we all agreed to stand by. That bill reaches this far and no further. But before discussing it I desire to say I wish it went further. I believe the interests of my State demand that it should go further. I believe the interests of the Indians demand that it should go further, and that the interests of the white men demand it go further. But I will not debate my own inclination, neither will I debate the inclinations of the citizenship of my State, but I do desire for a few moments to discuss the provisions of that bill that we have all agreed upon. That bill, if you please, starts out—and I will refer again to the four classes that I have jotted down for my own satisfaction—and removes the restrictions on the freedmen. Is there a man in this House that knows any reason why the restrictions should not be removed on the freedmen? They were negro slaves fifty years ago, but were emancipated even prior to the time that the slaves of the United States proper, the slaves of the white citizens, were emancipated. The Indians emancipated their slaves, those of the Five Civilized Tribes, prior to the emancipation of slaves in 1865. Can anyone understand or know why that bill should not pass as far as the freedmen are concerned? They have been very fortunate to share in that very valuable estate. They have been very fortunate to get on those rolls and be allotted all the way from 160 to 320 acres of valuable land. I see no reason why the restrictions should be kept on them longer. I do not believe it will be the disposition of this House to keep them on longer. I urge you, as a Representative from that State, not to do it.

Next we come to the intermarried white citizens. Can any Member of this House, can any fair-minded, thinking man know of any reason why a white citizen that goes down there and marries an Indian citizen, who, after being entitled to allotment, and after being entitled to derive all the advantages that the Indian citizen does—can anyone have any reason or any idea or offer any explanation why restrictions should not be removed? [Applause.]

The mixed blood of less than half Indian blood. Do you know what class of citizens they are? They are men just like CARTER of the House and Senator OWEN of the Senate. Do you think it is right for this Congress to say who CARTER should sell his land to? Do you think it is right to say who Senator OWEN should sell his land to? Do you think it would be right to force a citizen who has a little strain of Indian blood in his veins, but whose business acumen and whose zeal and business ability is above the average, to be and remain tied hand and foot regarding the control of his property, and be tied and hampered by refusing him the right to deal with his property in an untrammeled way? Surely this House can not do or say that and surely it will not attempt to do so. This bill that the Department has drawn up, and the entire delegation has agreed to support, and the Indian Committee now has in charge only provides that they be turned loose and act as other men may act.

I can not but say in the same regard, and while we are dealing with this class, that this class of Indian citizens, if they may be called Indians at all, are at the head of banking institutions of my State, are good lawyers, at the head of the best institutions of the State, and there is no occasion for any further restrictions, nor has there been for the last decade of years. Of course, while we were a Territory and largely under Federal control and restraint there was some little excuse for such paternalism, but since the State has been admitted as a sovereign State, and in the enabling act specifically reciting that they were full citizens and clothed with every power, surely the Government does not longer care to force restraint and restrictions upon a class of people who are holding the best offices in the State, some of the most competent in the State, educated, and with almost unusual business tact. It is not best for them; "it is not best for the Government;" it is not best for the State, and if this Congress can but understand and believe the facts as they there exist, they will not permit them longer to exist.

The next provision of the bill relates to those of more than half Indian blood and of full bloods. The bill does not remove the restrictions from them, but retains to the Interior Department, as it has been heretofore. I submit this Congress can not object to this provision; I submit there is no authority farmed out here, but all retained by the Department, which, of course, is under the supervision of Congress.

We of the delegation had hoped that the matter might be left to the courts of the State to determine when they were competent to transact their own business. We had from experience learned that government at long range was never satisfactory. While it looks all right and bears every earmark of fairness to let the Interior Department retain control, still knowing as we do the impossibility of transacting the business in person, knowing further as we do of the delays, the attorneys' fees the long trips to Washington, and the red tape, we had hoped to have that authority vested in the State courts, so they could examine each case and pass on the merits hurriedly and upon proof. But we will not debate our inclinations, and will hurriedly say, surely there can be no objection to this provision at the hands of Congress, for they are retaining all they had and so is the Interior Department.

I think it is the duty of this Congress to look to the welfare of the Indian citizen of our State next to the general welfare of the State, which is the youngest child of this Union. I take it that they are both indeed important, and this Congress is anxious indeed to carefully and painstakingly look after them both. This bill renders the Indians a great service, because it will help them to improve their homes and make their lands productive. It helps them because they will have public roads, public bridges, public schools, churches, and all the modern civilizing influences that walk hand in hand with these indispensable virtues. It helps the State because it will put about 6,000,000 acres of land on the tax rolls, will furnish thousands of homes for the homeless, and that will help them to maintain the State. You will remember that there are nineteen million in all; that three million have already been removed; that this bill will remove about six million more, and that will leave about ten million on the rolls free from taxes and free from power to sell, alienate, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of according to their will and wish.

This, of course, is but a terse statement of the effect it will have, for you will remember that the recent census tells us that the Indian Territory has a population of about 700,000 people and that about 101,000 of them are Indian citizens. So you see of the 600,000 class there are many bright-eyed boys and girls who would like to own their own home; would like to have a school to go to; would like to have a church to go to on Sunday; would like to have their parent freed from the taxation that almost amounts to confiscation for the little personal property they have; would like to have each person there pay a little; would like to have the soil share the burdens; would like to have a home they could call their own and not live as tenants all their lives. Let the land prosper and improve! Let the Indian prosper and improve! But let them come side by side in the grand new State of Oklahoma.

To-day in Oklahoma there is the warmest feeling between the two races. There is the warmest kindred spirit. There is the highest degree of brotherly love extant. Now, with this in view, let the Indian citizen be a free man. Let the white man own his own home. Let the State prosper and improve. Let Congress delegate to fair Oklahoma and her citizenship the same courtesies and kindnesses now that she did when they said every man within the State of Oklahoma should be a full citizen and clothed with all the rights of a citizen.

To-day in Oklahoma there is no red man, no white man, but one united citizenship. The Indian citizens, though largely in the minority, have been elected to the highest offices in the land—that of the Senate and Member of Congress. They are in the State legislature and the State senate that is now in session. They hold the major portion of the county offices on that side of the State. They are equal before the law of the State and nation, save and except for the restraint placed upon their lands. The kindliest feeling exists between the two races. We are proud to find a clause in the enabling act that makes them full citizens. We believe them to be full citizens. We stand side by side with them in all their undertakings.

It is a feeling to be applauded. It is right and it is proper. We are anxious to have it always remain the same. We find among them profligates, the same as we do among the other races; but no more. We find lack of frugality there, as we find it everywhere else. We also find among them brainy lawyers—honest and upright citizenship and honor and intelligence walking hand in hand with the white race of Oklahoma and of other States.

Oversentimental men point to isolated cases where Indians have been defrauded out of their lands, and they offer that as an excuse for further denial of freedom and of right. But that is an unfair test, for it is quite true in dealing with more than a hundred thousand people, I care not of what race or persuasion, there will be weaklings; there will be men unable to cope with the skill, zeal, and overzealous brother even of the same race or persuasion.

No; that is not a fair test. The true test should be, What will benefit the largest number? And about this I submit there can be no doubt. Practically all will be benefited and few harmed.

And let me suggest for the benefit of those who we will concede may not act wisely with their estates that the State is well able to care for them and will do so.

I am going to say that the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes in the major portion of cases are holding more land than they can hold profitably and more than they desire to hold themselves. We take a pencil and begin to calculate and we find that on the average they only have about 190 acres per capita. Many would at first blush say: "Why that is not too much land for one farmer to own," and while, in my judgment, it is, for small farms well tilled and well improved are always best, still it is not unreasonable, at least. But when you come to think that every member of the family has 190 acres as distinguished from heads of families, you can at once realize what I mean by saying they are land ridden and land poor. Example: Suppose Mr. "A" has a wife and eight children. This, as we will all agree, constitutes a total of ten in that one family. Now, multiply that ten by 190 acres, the per capita amount for big, little, old, and young, and we find one family with 1,900 acres of land. I am going to make the bold assertion that 1,900 acres of land are too much for a family of moderate or no means to own. It is more than they can till. It is more than they can use. It is more than they need. It holds the value of their own land back to permit it to lie idle. It retards the growth of the country; it denies the Indian family of close proximity with neighbors and home owners who would help to improve the country, help to improve the Indian citizen, help to maintain the State and to in all things accomplish the purpose of nature when she bequeathed this earth of ours to us as a sovereign race.

Now, in addition to the countless benefits that the Indian citizen would derive from the release of this restriction, you would give six-sevenths of the entire population of that half of the State a chance to help build up and improve the country, a chance to help build roads, build churches, build schoolhouses, help them to an opportunity to own their own homes, and make use of land that to-day lies idle. There are two sides of this matter. The Indian citizen comprises 101,000, the white citizen 600,000 on that side of the State and 1,300,000 in the entire State. These white brothers have helped make that a good State. The have brought their families from their homes and from old, tried, and true conditions into that frontier and helped make the land that was worth $1.25 per acre worth forty and fifty. They have left friends and settled conditions in the old home States to take up that new home in that new country. They have denied their bright-eyed boys and girls, that they love the same as you love yours, the right to have free schools, the right to live in their own homes, the right to live near churches, the right to have roads on the section lines. They have been forced to raise their families in poorly constructed tenant houses. They have been forced to deny their faithful wives and mothers the comforts and blessings of that one green spot called "home." These are some of the things that they have undergone to make Oklahoma what it is to-day, thus patiently and uncomplainingly awaiting a time when Congress could know of their conditions and could and would remedy them and relieve them.

To-day the State is new. To-day the closest ties of friendship exist between the two races. There is no doubt about that. Then, in the light of this, let me urge this Congress to do nothing, or, rather, do not refuse to do the one thing that will let this happy situation ever attend the two races. I speak of it in a spirit of delicacy when I say that if one race was continually discriminated against, and, in turn, the other race continually discriminated for, it would in time work an unfriendly feeling that would work to the disadvantage of the weaker race. I submit this is true of principle, true of experience and logic that will stand alone the world around.

We urge you to pass this bill that the Interior Department wants and has agreed to support; one that the Indian Office wants and agrees to support and aid with; a bill that was drawn by the Department; a bill that every member of the Oklahoma delegation has agreed to support, of course having a few mental reservations; but in substance it is right. The main criticism we have offered and urged was that it did not go far enough—a bill that is the product of many meetings, many conferences in which all of the Oklahoma Members were present, including the two United States Senators, and always including the Interior Department and the Indian Office; a bill that does not harm a hair in the head of any; a bill that does not touch the lands of the full bloods at all; a bill that does not touch the homesteads of those of half and more Indian blood; a bill that removes restrictions from a class of people who never have needed this restraint, for the ones affected by this bill are mostly people who have no Indian blood at all in their veins, but became a part of the tribes by marriage or as former slaves. And for the class of mixed bloods of less than half, you are dealing with men who are the best qualified business men in our country.

I earnestly ask for this bill, for it can not be wrong. I earnestly ask for this bill because it is a step in the right direction; I earnestly ask for this bill because it will help both white and red citizens; I earnestly ask that this bill be passed, for the State needs it badly, and you alone have power to give it. [Applause.] Idle lands as rich as the Nile in this twentieth century should be used. Industrious, frugal people should have the opportunity to own a home. Idle land does not produce and renders no one an advantage. You will not live to learn of your mistake if you pass this agreed bill. Oklahoma and her entire citizenship will suffer if you do not pass the bill. Oklahoma will rejoice if you pass the bill. In the name of no class, in the name of no race, in the name of no special interest, but in the name of great and small, weak and strong, red and white, and of the million and a half of people within the borders of Oklahoma, I ask for the passage of this bill. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

For the benefit of those who desire information in detail as to the quantum of Indian blood, as shown by the official rolls of the Interior Department, I will append to my remarks a tabulated statement which affords that information.

THE STATE OF MARYLAND,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

This is to certify that on the 25th day of March, 1908, John Walter Smith was, in accordance with law, duly chosen by the legislature of the State of Maryland a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the unexpired portion of the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1903, to fill the vacancy caused by the decease of Hon. William Pinkney Whyte.

Witness his excellency our governor and our seal hereto affixed at Annapolis this 25th day of March, in year of our Lord 1908.

AUSTIN L. CROTHERS.

By the Governor:
[SEAL.]

N. WINSLOW WILLIAMS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, the Senator-elect being present, I ask that he be sworn.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I am constrained to object to the oath of office being administered to Mr. Smith under the circumstances of this case. I do not think his election by the legislature of the State of Maryland is in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States. The Federal Constitution, Article I, section 4, provides that—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Exercising its prerogative under that provision of the Constitution the Congress on the 25th of July, 1866, passed the following act:

REVISED STATUTES, TITLE II, CHAPTER I—ELECTION OF SENATORS.

SEC. 14. The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

SEC. 15. Such election shall be conducted in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from such State, and the name of the person so voted for, who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house, shall be entered on the journal of that house by the clerk or secretary thereof; or if either house fails to give such majority to any person on that day, the fact shall be entered on the journal. At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid, the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person has received a majority of all the votes in each house, he shall be declared duly elected Senator. But if the same person has not received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house has failed to take proceedings as required by this section, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce of each member present, a person for Senator, and the person who receive a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected. If no person receives such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature, and shall take at least one vote, until a Senator is elected.

SEC. 16. Whenever on the meeting of the legislature of any State a vacancy exists in the representation of such State in the Senate, the legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after meeting and organization, to elect a person to fill such vacancy, in the manner prescribed in the preceding section for the election of a Senator for a full term.

SEC. 17. Whenever during the session of the legislature of any State a vacancy occurs in the representation of such State in the Senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized and has notice of such vacancy.

The constitutionality of this act has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States and sustained.

It will be observed that this act prescribes the method of procedure for the election of a Senator under three different conditions: First, at the beginning of a full term; second, for filling a vacancy which happens during a recess of the legislature; and, third, for filling a vacancy happening when the legislature is in session.

The case now before the Senate arises under section 17 of this act, which is as follows:

SEC. 17. Whenever, during the session of the legislature of any State, a vacancy occurs in the representation of such State in the Senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized and has notice of such vacancy.

The Senate will observe that the proceedings for the election of a Senator at the beginning of a term are as follows:

The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

Section 17 modifies the general course of procedure only in providing that the legislature shall proceed on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized and has notice of such vacancy.

It appears from the certificate presented and the records of the Senate that this election on the 25th day of March was not the second Tuesday after the organization of the legislature and notification of the vacancy.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire from the Senator what is the section of the act he is reading from?

Mr. BURROWS. Sections 16 and 17 of the Revised Statutes, commencing with section 14.

It seems from these credentials and from the records of the Senate that this election did not occur on the second Tuesday after notification of the vacancy. If I understand my friend the Senator from Maryland, it is conceded that this is true and that there is no controversy over that matter.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Michigan will understand that I do not concede for a moment that it was not the second Tuesday. That is one of the numerous points that I will be able to present to the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. I am unable to hear the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. I say that I can not concede that it was not the second Tuesday. I shall contend that it was the second Tuesday, and I do not want the Senator to understand that I admit any fact at all. It is a question of law. I will undoubtedly admit that Senator Whyte died, because I announced his death in the Senate. Senator Whyte died at 7 o'clock last Tuesday a week. The two houses met on Tuesday separately, under the sections here, and on Wednesday, yesterday, they met in joint convention and declared Senator Smith elected. I will undoubtedly concede the death of Senator Whyte at the time it took place, but I will not concede that the Tuesday upon which proceedings were commenced was not the second Tuesday. I claim most decidedly that it was the second Tuesday.

Mr. BURROWS. Do I understand the Senator's contention to be that the Tuesday of notification was the first Tuesday after notification within the meaning of the statute?

Mr. RAYNER. I can state to the Senator from Michigan my construction of the section, but I do not want to interrupt him now. I shall contend, and I think I can show the Senate by any number of authorities, that the question of notice does not apply to Tuesday at all and has nothing in the world to do with it. The question of notice is entirely separate from any other part of the section. A Senator can be elected on Monday, Wednesday, or any time, and I have precedents to sustain that position, in case of a vacancy during the session of the legislature after the second Tuesday from the time of its organization had passed.

Mr. BURROWS. It is conceded that Senator Whyte died on the 17th day of March, and that Mr. Smith's election took place on the 25th. It is admitted that the vacancy happened on Tuesday, March 17. The second Tuesday thereafter would be March 31. The legislature of Maryland proceeded to the election of a Senator on Tuesday, March 24, and consummated it in joint assembly March 25.

If it is the contention of the Senator from Maryland that Tuesday, the day of notification of the vacancy, is to be counted as the first Tuesday after notification, and that the second Tuesday therefore would be one week from that time, it is a construction never before suggested or insisted upon.

This matter has been several times passed upon by the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, but expressly in the case of Clagett against Dubois, when the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections consisted of Senators H. M. TELLER (chairman), George F. Hoar, John H. Mitchell, William E. Chandler, Anthony Higgins, James L. Pugh, and David Turpie, and in the course of that discussion, in the report of the majority, this statement is made:

> In this case the claim has been made upon the part of the sitting member, Mr. Dubois, that in the event it should be held that the organization contemplated by section 14 of the Revised Statutes means necessarily a permanent organization, which in this case it is conceded did not take place until Tuesday, December 9, although consummated prior to 12 o'clock meridian of that day; that still the next Tuesday following would be, within the meaning of the fourteenth section of the Revised Statutes, the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the legislature.
> While under the view taken of this case by the committee it is not necessary to decide this question, your committee are clearly of the opinion that this contention upon the part of Mr. Dubois is not well founded. It is the opinion of your committee that in the computation of time in respect of the provisions of this statute the first day, that is, the day of organization—
> In this case the day of notification—
> must in the count be excluded; consequently, where the organization takes place on a Tuesday, the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization provided in the statute would be two weeks from that date.

That rule has never been reversed or, so far as I know, questioned.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Michigan is quoting, I understand, the case of Clagett against Dubois, page 764.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULBERSON. I presume that if the Senator stands upon one of the rulings in that case he would stand upon the others. I call his attention therefore to the fact that Senator Dubois in that case was sworn; and the proposition now is an objection on the part of the Senator from Michigan to the oath of office being administered to the Senator-elect from Maryland.

Mr. BURROWS. The controversy in that case, let me say to the Senator, was over the question whether the organization was a temporary organization or a permanent organization and whether a temporary organization was a compliance with the statute.

Mr. RAYNER. May I ask the Senator what page of the volume he reads from?

Mr. BURROWS. Page 787.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator will pardon me, I call his attention to the syllabus, which says:

> Objection was made, and the matter went over until the following day, when Mr. Dubois was sworn.

The Senator reads from this case as authority upon another proposition, which will be met in due time, I take it. I ask him if he is not willing to submit to the same authority and have the oath of office administered to the Senator-elect from Maryland, who is present and ready to take it.

Mr. BURROWS. That case, as I said before, was decided upon entirely different grounds. I cite this for the purpose of showing that the committee was united upon the proposition that the Tuesday on which the organization was consummated—or, in this case, notice given—was not to be counted.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator if that proposition is sound and the decision in that case is sound, why does he not follow it entirely and permit the oath of office to be administered as it was in the case of Dubois?

Mr. BURROWS. I need not repeat that that is entirely different. The exact issue in the case of Dubois was not upon that point, but this very question was raised and the committee passed upon it and determined that the day of organization was not counted and could not be counted as the first Tuesday after organization. The Tuesday of organization is not the first Tuesday after organization. I do not see how it is open to argument. The Tuesday of notification is not the first Tuesday after notification. The second Tuesday after notice must be two weeks after that time, as was decided in the Dubois case.

It appears in this case, from the RECORD, from the credentials presented, and from the Journal of the Senate, that this election on Tuesday, the 25th of the present month, was not the second Tuesday after notification of the vacancy. It could not be. Senator Whyte died Tuesday, March 17. Notice of his death could not have been given to the legislature before it occurred, and if given Tuesday, the 17th, the day it happened, the second Tuesday after such notification would be the 31st. I quote from the RECORD the remarks of the Senator from Maryland on the 18th day of March, announcing the death of his colleague.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. Before we get to the argument of this case—of course the Senator wants the facts properly set off—and if he will look at the decision in Clagett's case——

Mr. BURROWS. It is impossible for me to hear the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. I am similarly situated. I have heard hardly a word the Senator said. By the language you have read just now you will find there is a mistake apparent upon the face of it. Let me read it.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Senator allow me to complete my statement, and then make his reply?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly; but there is a mistake in dates, which changes the whole case.

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator can criticise——

Mr. RAYNER. I do not want to criticise; I want to direct your attention to it. The legislature met and organized, as found by your committee, on Monday, December 8, while the contestant claims that the organization was in effect on Tuesday, December 9. So in any event, inasmuch as the election of Mr. Dubois took place on Tuesday, December 18, that was impossible. If one Tuesday was December 9, it is utterly impossible for any other Tuesday to be December 18. So, you see, there is a mistake apparent on the face of the report. It could not have been December 18, because the following Tuesday was December 16, and not December 18.

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator will have an opportunity to review that case.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. As I recollect the Dubois case, it went off upon another question.

Mr. BURROWS. Entirely.

Mr. TELLER. It was decided upon the question whether the legislature was organized, and, as I recall it, we held that the legislature was organized whenever it was in a condition to enact laws. On that he retained his seat.

Mr. BURROWS. I am obliged to the Senator from Colorado, who was chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections at that time. I had already stated that the controversy was over the question as to whether the organization was a permanent or a temporary organization, and although not necessary to the determination of the case, yet the committee held that in determining the proper date for the election the Tuesday of organization, whether it be a permanent or temporary organization, should be excluded. That Tuesday is to be excluded, and two weeks from that time would be the second Tuesday after organization within the meaning of the statute.

But, to resume, I repeat the certificate of election in this case and the records of the Senate disclose the fact that only eight days had elapsed between the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Whyte and the election by the legislature of Maryland; and I submit that it is not in accordance with the laws and Constitution of the United States, and Mr. Smith is not therefore entitled to be sworn.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I shall be very much mistaken if I can not convince the Senate within a very short time that the Senator from Michigan has fallen into an error upon the question under discussion. I shall do this principally by precedents that I have that I think conclusively settle the matter.

I wish to state, in the first place, that there is no contestant here at all. There is no protest whatever against the seating of the Senator-elect. Governor Whyte died last Tuesday a week at 7 o'clock. The general assembly of Maryland, then in session, had immediate notice of his death. The law does not speak of any official notice, and does not require any.

On the following Tuesday—that is to say, Tuesday of this week—the two Houses initiated their proceedings for the election of a Senator to fill the unexpired term of Senator Whyte. They met on Tuesday for that purpose, and yesterday, Wednesday, met in joint convention. The Senator-elect who is now present was declared in accordance with the law to have received the majority of votes and to be the duly elected Senator. The legislature of Maryland adjourns next Monday by constitutional limitation. If the Senator is right in what he states, Maryland will be without its proper representation upon this floor.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. Is there any prohibition which would prevent of the governor of the State calling an extra session of the legislature on next Tuesday?

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, we do not propose to call an extra session of the legislature of Maryland if the Senator from Maryland is entitled to be sworn in, as I contend that he is. There is no constitutional inhibition upon the governor, but the governor does not propose to do it, and the people of Maryland do not want him to do it. If I am right in the position I am now assuming, the Senator-elect has a right to be sworn in; whatever question may arise in the Committee on Privileges and Elections after the oath is taken, the question now is upon his right to be sworn in upon the face of his credentials.

Now, Mr. President, I shall be very brief about this matter. Governor Whyte died last Tuesday a week. The second Tuesday after the legislature had organized had long since passed. Right at the threshold of this discussion, I want the Senator from Michigan to understand that I am now construing this statute, I am construing what this ambiguous section means if it is possible to get a construction of it. Now come these words:

> And has notice of such vacancy.

It does not say two Tuesdays must elapse after the notice is given. There is not a word in the section about that. There is not one word there that by any legal construction that I have ever heard of would permit the Senate to say that when the section says "has notice" two Tuesdays must elapse between the time of the notice and the time that proceedings are initiated. I have four different points upon which I claim that the Senator-elect from Maryland is entitled to be sworn in. The first point is that this section ought not to receive the interpretation that the Senator from Michigan has given it. Let me read it:

> Whenever during the session of the legislature of any State a vacancy occurs in the representation of such State in the Senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized.

That is impossible, because if there is a vacancy after the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized it is impossible to fill that vacancy before the vacancy occurs. Therefore the section can not mean that at all. You must take this section in connection with the other two sections and give a decision from the context of all three sections. It will be utterly impossible for proceedings to fill a vacancy to occur on a day when the vacancy does not exist.

Now, the Senator from Michigan wants to construe this section in this way. He wants to interpolate these words: It reads:

> Whenever during the session of the legislature of any State a vacancy occurs in the representation of such State in the Senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized.

I have shown the Senate that that is impossible.

The Senator from Michigan wants to interpolate these words:

> And on the second Tuesday after the legislature has notice of such vacancy.

There are no words in that section of that sort. You will have to make a bold interpolation right into the body of the section in order to reach the purpose he wants to accomplish. I say, according to his views, not only must the legislature elect, where a vacancy takes place during the session of the legislature, on the second Tuesday, which is impossible if the Senator is not dead on the second Tuesday, but it is necessary for him to put in the words "and on the second Tuesday after the legislature has notice of such vacancy." There are no such words in that section, and you will have to force those words in in order to get the construction which the Senator from Michigan asks.

Now, Mr. President, what does this section mean? I want Senators to look at it to see whether I am not right in having all the other sections taken with it. You must construe the whole act of 1866 together. You can not take just one provision of an act and give it a construction without looking at the whole of the act. It means this—and the Senate will come to the conclusion that it means it, and if it comes to any other conclusion it is treading on dangerous ground—that an election for United States Senator shall not take place in any event until the second Tuesday after the organization, and it does not mean anything else.

It can not mean anything else without rendering the section absolutely absurd. All those three sections taken together simply mean that an election for United States Senator shall not in any event be held until the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized; and the question of notice has nothing to do with it. After the legislature has organized and there is a vacancy I submit the legislature has a perfect right, if the second Tuesday has expired, to proceed immediately to the election of a United States Senator, no matter upon what date it took place and no matter when the notice may have been given.

I appeal to every lawyer upon this floor whether there is any other possible construction to be given to this section unless you render it absolutely nugatory in its terms. I want to call attention to this because this is a matter of great importance. The sixteenth section provides for the election of a Senator in regular form, and it has these words in it:

> Shall proceed on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization.

Now, omitting one section, which merely refers to the proceedings, the next section provides that:

> Where a vacancy occurs at the assembling of the legislature the legislature shall again proceed upon the second Tuesday after the meeting.

In this section when the vacancy occurs during the session of the legislature it says—> similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday.

It is ridiculous, because there may be no vacancy, as I have shown, and was not in this case until the second Tuesday had expired. Every statute must receive a sensible construction. The Senate will give the construction to this statute that it would receive in any judicial forum. You must take these three sections together and the purport of them is what I have said now frequently.

All they mean is that you can not elect a Senator until the second Tuesday after organization, and they mean nothing else:

and when they come to notice there is no word there that two Tuesdays must have elapsed after notice was given, unless you interpolate into the body of the section, as I have said, the words "and on the second Tuesday after the legislature has notice." There are no such words in the body of that section, and Congress never meant so to legislate. That is my first point, which, I think, settles this controversy.

But I have other points that I shall pass through in rapid succession which I think will appeal to gentlemen of our profession on this floor who are accustomed to give opinions upon statutory construction. It is a question we must carefully examine into. You can not give an opinion about it simply by reading this section and taking it according to its strict phraseology. Even taking it that way, however, there is nothing here which says that two Tuesdays must elapse before notice.

Now, let me come to the second point. I want the attention of the Senator from Michigan. These sections are only directory, not mandatory; that is to say, the legislature can not proceed before the second Tuesday, but it can proceed afterwards. The Senate has so decided upon two separate occasions and I will give you the precedents. If the legislature did not proceed at all on the second Tuesday and proceeded on the third Tuesday the election would be perfectly good. I invite the attention of the Senator from Michigan to these propositions of law——

Mr. BURROWS. I am listening.

Mr. RAYNER. Because, I repeat, this section is only directory; and if the legislature of Maryland had proceeded on the third Tuesday or the fourth Tuesday or the fifth Tuesday the election would be perfectly good, and this Senate has so determined. I will give you the cases upon that point.

I refer now to the decision in the Hart case, which you will find on page 379 of the Senate Election Cases. You must draw the distinction between what is mandatory in a statute and what is directory. Time is generally directory. On page 379 will be found the case of Ossian B. Hart v. Abijah Gilbert. I presume we had then as good a Committee on Privileges and Elections as we ever had in this body. There were then upon that committee Mr. Trumbull, who was its chairman; Mr. Edmunds was on the committee; Mr. Conkling was on the committee; Mr. Carpenter was on the committee; Mr. Rice and Mr. Stewart were also on the committee, and Mr. Thurman was on the committee. I presume they gave a very profound and not a passing and superficial examination to the questions which were involved in this controversy.

There were three Senators to be elected by the State of Florida. Two of them were elected in accordance with the act of Congress, but in reference to the third Senator, they did not commence proceedings at all until Thursday. There were no proceedings at all, as directed by the act of 1866, until that day. There were no proceedings on Tuesday at all; and the unanimous report of the committee is as follows:

> The legislature by which the sitting member was elected was the one chosen next preceding the term which would commence on the 4th of March, 1869, and was, therefore, the proper legislature to elect. "The second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the legislature" was the time prescribed by the act of Congress for initiating the election of Senators, and that was the time when the legislature proceeded to that business. There being three Senators to elect, it took action on that day only in reference to two of them. Did its failure to take action on that day, and the two subsequent days (which were occupied in electing the first two Senators), in reference to the third Senator, render his election, in all other respects regular, invalid? The committee think not.

There you have a report of a committee, as I have said, composed of Messrs. Trumbull (its chairman), Stewart, Edmunds, Conkling, Rice, Carpenter, and Thurman. Some of them were in Congress when the law was passed. This is a direct decision that under this first section the law was only directory.

There was an election, understand, in Florida for three Senators. Proceedings were initiated in reference to two of them on Tuesday. Nothing was done in reference to the third Senator on Wednesday, and nothing was done until Thursday; and, notwithstanding the language which, as I say, upon an entirely superficial examination may satisfy anyone that it is mandatory, nothing was done upon Tuesday, as set forth in the act of the assembly; and yet the committee unanimously held that even if the proceedings were initiated on Thursday, instead of Tuesday, the Senator was entitled to his seat.

I have another case right on that point. This first case is conclusive, but I have another one right on the same point, and that is the case of Messrs. Lapham and Miller, found on page 698 of the same volume. If the Senate seeks to make these sections mandatory, the time will come when it will regret it, especially in a case of this kind, with the legislature adjourning, to command the State to call an extra session of its legislature when the election was proper, when the credentials are proper, and there is no contest, and not a single protest against the seating of its representative.

On page 698 the same question arises—Is the statute mandatory or is it directory? This was the committee of which Mr. Hoar was chairman at the time. This was in the election case, as I have said, of Elbridge G. Lapham and Warner Miller.

> The memorials set forth five reasons as grounds why these gentlemen should not be allowed to sit here.

Mr. BURROWS. From what page is the Senator from Maryland reading?

Mr. RAYNER. I am reading from the third or fourth paragraph on page 698 of this volume.

This should end it, I think, upon this floor if the first case does not.

This report states:

> The memorials set forth five reasons as grounds why these gentlemen should not be allowed to sit here. The first alleges that the legislature did not proceed in separate bodies to vote upon the question until the third Tuesday after notice of the vacancy was communicated by the governor. The facts are such as to create some controversy as to whether they did proceed on the second Tuesday or the third Tuesday after the notice; but, in any view, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that the legislature was not deprived of its constitutional right to elect Senators to this body.

Now, if those two decisions are law and bind the Senate, the legislature is not bound by the provision of the statute which says the second Tuesday, but can proceed upon the third Tuesday. Of course if they can proceed upon the third Tuesday, they can proceed upon the fourth Tuesday or the fifth Tuesday, or upon any Tuesday upon which the legislature sits, or upon any day subsequent to the second Tuesday after organization.

Where is there any law that you must give a mandatory construction to this provision of the statute which by only an interpolation can be made to read that two Tuesdays must elapse after the notice is given?

These cases are much weaker cases than the case I now present, because, as I have said over and over again, there is nothing in the statute whatever—not a word—that any Tuesday shall elapse after notice is given; but it simply uses the words "has notice of such vacancy." The legislature could have proceeded upon the night of the notice, in accordance with these decisions, if it had so determined, immediately upon having actual notice of Senator Whyte's death—for the law requires no official notice—it could immediately have proceeded to elect another Senator in his place, if these decisions mean anything. That is my second point.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAYNER. I do.

Mr. KNOX. Before the Senator proceeds to the consideration of his third proposition, I should like to ask him a question with respect to his second proposition. I only want to ask a question. The two cases which the Senator has cited refer to proceedings by the legislature after the expiration of the second Tuesday. Does the Senator have any knowledge of any case where the legislature undertook to proceed before the expiration of the second Tuesday? Are there any precedents on that line?

Mr. RAYNER. None whatever; and that is my contention. I contend here that the legislature can not proceed to the election of a Senator until the second Tuesday has expired after its organization, and that is the construction that I put on this section. That is all. If the Senator also finds that there are no decisions against that point, it only confirms the proposition for which I am contending.

My contention is that the legislature has no right to proceed to the election of a United States Senator until the second Tuesday has expired after its organization, and when that second Tuesday expires, if no proceedings have been commenced, under the section it can commence the proceedings on any future day. That is the decision, as the Senator from Pennsylvania will find if he will look into it carefully. I have not read the whole decision, but that is the decision in Gilbert's case, and that is the decision in Lapham and Miller's case. Now, I come to another point.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RAYNER. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. Is it the contention of the Senator that the legislature of Maryland, having been organized the requisite length of time prescribed, could have proceeded the day after it received notice to have elected a successor to Senator Whyte?

Mr. RAYNER. Unquestionably, if the second Tuesday had expired. If the second Tuesday under the statute had expired and a vacancy occurred after that second Tuesday, the legislature can proceed at any time after actual notice to elect a successor to a deceased Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. That is, say, if they receive notice the day of the death when the vacancy happened they might have proceeded to elect a Senator on that day or the next day or any other day that suited the pleasure of the legislature?

Mr. RAYNER. After they have been in session and after the second Tuesday had expired, undoubtedly, unquestionably. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if they can proceed on the third Tuesday, why can they not proceed on the fourth or fifth Tuesday? In this case it was perhaps the ninth or tenth Tuesday.

Mr. FORAKER. I was not asking the Senator the question in a controversial way, but only to understand the proposition the Senator was advancing. If I understand the argument of the Senator, it is that the second Tuesday must come to pass after the organization——

Mr. RAYNER. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER. But not after notice.

Mr. RAYNER. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER. If the organization has been long enough prior——

Mr. RAYNER. That is my proposition.

Mr. FORAKER. And that in this case, the legislature having been a long time in session, receiving notice of the death of Senator Whyte, might have elected the following day?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes; that is my proposition, and there is nothing in the statute against it—not a word. It says "after notice." It does not say when after notice—not a word. The Senator from Ohio has had opportunity after opportunity of construing statutes of this sort, and I will guarantee that, if he was on the bench, he would give it such a construction, and that is exactly what I mean and nothing else, unless you want to render it absurd and ridiculous upon its face. It means that after the second Tuesday has expired, whenever there is notice of death after that second Tuesday, the legislature can proceed forthwith, because it does not say two Tuesdays must elapse after notice. The only way, as I have said, that it can receive the construction that the Senator from Michigan puts upon it, is by interpolating in the body of the section the words that "after notice and on the second Tuesday after the legislature has notice." He must put those words in in order to reach that construction.

Mr. President, I have finished the first two points. Now I come to the third point, to which I want to call the attention of the Senate. The point is this: The State of Maryland has decided that the Tuesday upon which this election was held was the second Tuesday, within the meaning of the statute. They have closed that question, and the Senate has no right collaterally to impeach the verdict of this legislature.

These propositions I am depending upon are all distinct one from another. The legislature of Maryland has decided this matter just precisely as if they had passed an act of assembly saying that the Tuesday upon which proceedings were commenced was the second Tuesday, because they have elected the Senator upon that day, and therefore by his election, so far as the State of Maryland is concerned, have closed the question that this Tuesday was the second Tuesday, and the Senate has no right to question that adjudication. Now, one moment on that. There is no answer to that, I apprehend, from anyone who has examined the cases.

Senator Whyte died last Tuesday a week ago at 7 o'clock in the evening. Notice was immediately given, because within an hour of his death I will guarantee that every Member of the House and Senate knew of his death. Tuesday had not expired. In our State we did not regard the fraction of a day in this case. The legislature of Maryland has therefore determined by its proceedings that the Tuesday following was the second Tuesday. Has the Senate a right to go behind that adjudication? I think not.

The question was up in the election of Senator Turpie from Indiana. I refer that case to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TELLER. What page?

Mr. RAYNER. I am trying to find the case now. It is on page 719. The question in the case of Senator Turpie of Indiana was this—and, of course I am not reading all these cases; I am just giving the purport of them—the claim was made that there were two members of the Senate of Indiana—Senator Turpie having been elected, I think, by a majority of two—that were not entitled to their seats. There were two members in the body who ought not to have been there, and it was with the vote of those two members that Senator Turpie was elected. The Senate committee, again with Mr. Hoar as its chairman, I think, unanimously held—that as to the two members seated by the Senate so organized, the judgment of the senate of Indiana was conclusive on the Senate of the United States, and that the latter body could not inquire into the motive of the former.

If the judgment of the senate of Indiana was conclusive upon the Senate of the United States upon a question whether a Senator was elected—because the question here was whether he was elected by a sufficient number of votes in the general assembly—how can it be said that the judgment of the State of Maryland as to what constituted the second Tuesday is not conclusive upon the Senate of the United States?

This case is followed by the case—I will not read it, but I will refer it to the chairman of the committee—of Senator SCOTT, of West Virginia, where the same proposition was determined, on page 892.

This brings me, Mr. President, to the last point, and I now submit to the Senate that even if I am wrong on every proposition I have stated, I can not be wrong upon this proposition which I now address to the Senate.

Even if this Tuesday was not the second Tuesday, if the construction of the Senator from Michigan is a correct construction, if this statute is mandatory and not directory, if the verdict of the Maryland legislature can be set aside by the Senate of the United States, then I contend that upon an unbroken line of authority, the credentials being in proper form, the Senator has the right to be sworn in, and the question must go, if at all, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections after he takes his oath and is seated in this body. I will give the cases on that point, and I think there is no question about it. I ask the Senator from Michigan to give me a single case where a Senator was ever denied the right to be sworn in when his credentials were proper and were right, or where they were collaterally impeached, and he was prevented from taking the oath of office. In all these contested-election cases that went to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, where they were controverted and disputed, some of them taking weeks and months for their adjudication, the Senator was sworn in, and the controversy took place after he took his seat. In none of them did the Senate do what the Senator from Michigan now asks the Senate to do, and that is, to send it to the committee, where, perhaps, we can not get a decision until after our legislature adjourns next Monday.

The first case I will give the Senator is the case of Lamar, page 634. This question, I respectfully submit, has passed beyond the pale of controversy, even if the Senator from Michigan is right in his contention. The oath must now be administered, and if there is any attack upon the proceedings, it must afterwards be made in the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Lamar was first elected for the term beginning March 4, 1877. Objection being made March 5, 1877, to the oath of office being administered to him, his credentials were laid on the table.

Then:

Mr. Wallace submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the credentials of L. Q. C. Lamar, Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, be taken from the table and that he be sworn."

Mr. Spencer called for the reading of a report made to the Senate at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, on the subject of recent elections in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. Wallace having objected to the reading of the said report,

The Vice-President submitted the question to the Senate, Shall the report be read? and it was determined in the negative.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. Wallace,

On motion by Mr. Spencer to amend the resolution by striking out, in the last line thereof, the words "that he be sworn," and in lieu thereof inserting "be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections when the committee shall be appointed,"

There was the direct question presented to the Senate that is presented now. An attempt was made to impeach the title of Mr. Lamar as United States Senator. The question before the Senate that the Senate was called upon to determine was whether he should be sworn in or whether his certificate should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

After debate it was determined in the negative—yeas 1, nays 58.

One Senator voting that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and fifty-eight Senators voting that he be sworn in.

So it was

Resolved, That the credentials of L. Q. C. Lamar, Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, be taken from the table and that he be sworn.

Whereupon

The oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. Lamar by the Vice-President, and he took his seat in the Senate.

Afterwards the question came up and precisely the same proceedings took place in Senator Morgan's case, on page 636:

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. Bayard, viz:

"Resolved, That the credentials of John T. Morgan, Senator-elect from the State of Alabama, be taken from the table, and that he be sworn."

On motion by Mr. Spencer, to amend the resolution by striking out, in the last line thereof, the words "he be sworn," and in lieu thereof inserting "they be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections when appointed,"

After debate, it was determined in the negative.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. Bayard, it was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That the credentials of John T. Morgan, Senator-elect from the State of Alabama, be taken from the table, and that he be sworn."

Whereupon

Mr. Morgan appeared at the bar of the Senate, and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. Morgan by the Vice-President, he took his seat in the Senate.

The same thing took place in the case of Mr. Call, from Florida. There is no case on record at all where the Senate would decline to seat a Senator when his credentials were perfectly proper on their face. I will read from Mr. Call's case, on page 805:

December 7, 1891, R. H. M. Davidson presented the credentials from the governor of Florida described in the following case, at the same time a transcript of the proceedings of the two houses of the legislature of Florida in a joint convention, composed of a majority of the members of the two houses, but not of a majority of the members of each, recording what purported to be the election of Wilkinson Call. Mr. Call presented himself on the same day, claiming the right to take the oath by virtue of the proceedings of that joint convention.

* * * * * * *

On motion by Mr. Hoar,

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion yesterday submitted by him, that the oath of office be administered to Wilkinson Call as a Senator from the State of Florida; and

The motion was agreed to.

Whereupon

Mr. Call appeared, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him by the Vice-President, he took his seat in the Senate.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that afterwards, on the motion of Mr. Hoar, it was:

Ordered, That the credentials of Wilkinson Call and also the credentials of R. H. M. Davidson, claiming a seat in the Senate by appointment of the governor of Florida, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

But not until after the Senator had been sworn. In the case of Ady v. Martin, from the State of Kansas, the direct point arose whether the Senator should be sworn in or whether the credentials should be sent to the committee before the oath was administered. In this case Senators will recall the fact that there was a pretense that the legislature that elected him was not a properly organized legislature. It was a very important question, and it was afterwards argued in the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I ask the special attention of the Senator from Michigan, because I suppose he would feel bound by some decisions of Mr. Hoar on this question, if consideration ought to be paid to precedents or decisions, and this case ought not to be decided upon some individual construction of the statute. The direct question came up in the case of Ady v. Martin, on page 812. Here is the statement of Mr. Hoar. That was a hotly contested case for a time in the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Mr. HOAR. The credentials of Mr. Martin seem to be in due form and to entitle him prima facie to be admitted to a seat in the Senate. If there be any question as to his title upon the merits, the Senate can deal with it afterwards. I ask that the oath be administered to Mr. Martin.

Mr. Martin was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. Peffer, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate. (Cong. Rec., vol. 25, p. 2.)

That was upon the same day that "Mr. Peffer presented the credentials of John Martin, recently elected a Senator from the State of Kansas." That ought to settle it. What is the answer to that? Is there an answer to this case? An examination of the decisions shows that every one of these Senators was sworn before the question was submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Now, one word more, and I have finished. The same thing occurred in the case of Senator George L. Shoup.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to ask the Senator a question. I will not interrupt him if it is not convenient.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator will not interrupt me. Certainly he can ask me any question he wants to.

Mr. LODGE. I am speaking merely from memory, but Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, came here with his credentials in perfect order, and the Senate did not allow him to be sworn in.

Mr. RAYNER. Was he not appointed by the governor?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; but his credentials were in perfect order.

Mr. RAYNER. There was no question about his appointment by the governor?

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably none.

Mr. RAYNER. That is not the question here at all. This is no appointment by the governor. As the Senator from Massachusetts knows, the governor has no right to appoint in a case where the legislature refuses to elect.

Mr. LODGE. I did not take that view at the time; but Senator Quay's credentials were absolutely in order, which is the only point about swearing in. His credentials were perfectly regular and in order, and he was not sworn in. It is entirely within the province of the Senate to exclude a Senator from being sworn in.

Mr. RAYNER. I must say that that is a very insufficient answer to what I am stating. The credentials certified upon their face that Senator Quay was appointed by the governor, and also showed that the governor had no right to appoint.

Mr. LODGE. I do not attempt to answer the Senator; I have no desire to do so, but was attempting to get some information from him and failed.

Mr. RAYNER. The credentials showed on their face that the governor appointed Senator Quay, and, therefore, the very credentials upon their face showed that there was a violation of law, because the governor had no right to appoint.

Mr. LODGE. I think this credential shows on its face a grave defect.

Mr. RAYNER. What is the mistake, I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts? The Senator from Michigan has passed on those credentials. What is the mistake? He said they were in proper form.

Mr. LODGE. I think it shows there was error. The Senator from Michigan pointed out——

Mr. RAYNER. What is the error?

Mr. LODGE. That he was not elected on the second Tuesday; that he was elected before the second Tuesday had arrived.

Mr. RAYNER. Now, the Senator from Massachusetts makes another mistake, because the credentials show no such thing. They do not show when Governor Whyte died at all. Governor Whyte might have been dead a month on the face of that credential, so far as the face of the credential is concerned. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. It appears on the face of the RECORD and the Journal of the Senate and the credential.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Massachusetts is talking about the Journal of the Senate. Just now he was talking about the certificate of election. Which does he mean?

Mr. LODGE. I mean the credentials on their face contradict the Journal.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Massachusetts did not state that. My answer to that is——

Mr. LODGE. No; I thought you would see it without my stating it.

Mr. RAYNER. I would have seen it without your stating it, but you stated it in the wrong way. You said that it appeared upon the face of the credentials. They do not say that.

Mr. LODGE. I think they do.

Mr. RAYNER. Say how they do. How does it appear upon the face of the credentials that anything took place in violation of law. I will give the Senator time to show this.

Mr. BURROWS rose.

Mr. RAYNER. No; let the Senator from Massachusetts speak. He has made a statement.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is shown on the face of the credentials that the Senator whose credentials are being presented was elected too soon.

Mr. RAYNER. How do they show it?

Mr. LODGE. By the dates.

Mr. RAYNER. They do not show that by the dates. The Senator will correct that statement, because the credentials do not show when Senator Whyte died. Therefore the credentials can not show it by the dates.

Mr. LODGE. That is just what they do show.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator contest the date of Senator Whyte's death?

Mr. RAYNER. There is no notice in the credentials of the date of Senator Whyte's death at all.

Mr. LODGE. The credentials are not required to show that.

Mr. RAYNER. You said the credentials do show it.

Mr. LODGE. They are not obituary notices.

Mr. RAYNER. You have stated that they did.

Mr. LODGE. I repeat it. They show it by the date; and if I can not make the Senator from Maryland understand it, it is not my fault.

Mr. RAYNER. I will guarantee there is not a man in the Senate who understands it, and I undertake to say the Senator himself does not understand it.

Mr. LODGE. There are an abundance of Senators who understand it, as the Senator will find.

Mr. RAYNER. It takes a man with a thorough knowledge of his profession to pass an opinion on this case. Let me read the credentials and see if they show on their face anything of the kind. The Senator from Michigan has passed upon them, and he says the credentials are in proper form.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. RAYNER. Not just now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland declines to yield.

Mr. RAYNER. I want to read them, because the Senator from Massachusetts has made a statement, unintentionally of course, which is not borne out by the facts. He has mixed up the credentials with something that appears in the records of the Senate, as if the two were the same thing, as if the records of the Senate and the credentials were the same. Let me read the credentials:

THE STATE OF MARYLAND,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

This is to certify that on the 25th day of March, 1908, John Walter Smith was, in accordance with law, duly chosen by the legislature of the State of Maryland a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the unexpired portion of the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1903, to fill the vacancy caused by the decease of Hon. William Pinkney Whyte.

Witness his excellency our governor and our seal hereto affixed, at Annapolis, this 25th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1908.

[SEAL] AUSTIN L. CROTHERS.

By the Governor:

N. WINSLOW WILLIAMS,
Secretary of State.

How does it appear here that the 25th day of March was not six Tuesdays after Senator Whyte had died? It might be, except for what appears on the Journal.

Mr. LODGE. It appears plainly on reading. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to hear from any other Senator if he agrees with the Senator from Massachusetts—a single Senator.

Mr. LODGE. The Senators are not here to be called upon as witnesses by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator ought to be careful about stating facts without being able to show that the facts exist. Show me upon the face of the credentials where such a reference is made.

Mr. LODGE. It shows that the vacancy was caused by the death of Senator Whyte.

Mr. RAYNER. Does it show the date of his death?

Mr. LODGE. Of course not, but it shows that Mr. Smith was elected on the 25th. That is enough.

Mr. RAYNER. Could that not have been five Tuesdays after?

Mr. LODGE. The credentials show on their face that he was elected unlawfully; that he was elected too soon.

Mr. RAYNER. How do they show that he was elected too soon?

Mr. LODGE. I have told the Senator that it appears obviously by the date. I can not furnish him with understanding.

Mr. RAYNER. And no one else on earth can understand the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to Senators——

Mr. RAYNER. No one else can understand it. I repeat, the Senator from Massachusetts himself does not understand it. If the credentials had stated upon their face the time Governor Whyte had died, the Senator would be perfectly right, but the credentials upon their face do not show that this election was not held on the fourth or fifth Tuesday after. It is a perfectly proper credential. The Senator from Michigan passed upon it.

There is not one word upon the face of the paper to the effect that he was not elected until after the second Tuesday after Governor Whyte's death. You have to take the Senate proceedings. That is what is in the Senator's mind. You have to take my announcement in the Senate that Governor Whyte had died last Tuesday, and if you take my announcement, together with the credentials, then it does appear by uniting the two. But upon these credentials nothing of the sort appears, and the credentials are perfectly regular and proper upon their face. If the Senator will read them over again he will come to the same conclusion.

Now, just one word, and I shall have finished. The case of Clagett against Dubois has no connection with this matter at all. The whole question in Clagett against Dubois was, as the Senator from Colorado will recollect, whether the legislature was organized. It was a question whether there was a temporary or permanent organization. That was the whole question in Clagett against Dubois—whether there was a temporary or a permanent organization. I want to point the Senator from Michigan to another thing in Clagett against Dubois. I wish to call attention to this:

The legislature met and organized, as found by your committee, on Monday, December 8, while contestant claims the organization was not effected until Tuesday, December 9; so, in any event, inasmuch as the election of Mr. Dubois took place on Tuesday, December 18—

How was that possible? How can Tuesday be December 9 and Tuesday, December 18? Does not that show upon its face that it is a mistake? I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts can answer that question that Tuesday can be December 9 and another Tuesday December 18.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The legislature met on Monday. They organized what the committee determined was a proper organization, and a week from the next day they elected.

Mr. RAYNER. That part is all right. But I want to know how Tuesday——

Mr. TELLER. They elected within a week and a day from the time of organization.

Mr. RAYNER. That is all right. How can Tuesday be December 9 and Tuesday December 18?

Mr. TELLER. That must be an error in the print. It is not worth while spending any time over that.

Mr. RAYNER. What day did the election take place?

Mr. TELLER. A week from the day they organized.

Mr. RAYNER. I will ask the Senator from Colorado when did they organize?

Mr. TELLER. They organized on the 9th.

Mr. RAYNER. On Tuesday?

Mr. TELLER. No, on Monday; and a week from the next day the election took place.

Mr. RAYNER. A week from the following Tuesday?

Mr. TELLER. Naturally it would be Tuesday.

Mr. RAYNER. The language here is different from what the Senator from Colorado says. It says, "It was ten days after the organization of the legislature" that the election took place. But that case has nothing in the world to do with this. The question was whether it was a case of temporary or permanent organization.

Mr. President, I have finished what I wish to say, and I rest upon these four propositions: First, that the section is not entitled to the interpretation the Senator from Michigan puts upon it; second, that the section is only directory, not mandatory; third, the State of Maryland has decided it; and fourth, if I am all wrong in everything else I have said, the Senator-elect is now entitled to be sworn in, and this question should go to the committee, as has been done in every other case, for further examination. I ask, therefore, that the Senator be sworn in.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has presented this case very clearly, but I ask the indulgence of the Senate briefly upon it. There are, it occurs to me, two fortunate aspects in which the case is presented. One is that there is no personal contest for the Senatorship involved, and the other that there is no partisan emergency in the Senate which could possibly, if that were at all possible in any case, influence the vote of any Senator along partisan lines. It ought to be decided, therefore, free from personality and free from partisanship, upon broad lines of constitutional construction.

The issue as presented in this case, just at the moment, is not whether the Senator from Maryland was lawfully elected to the Senate, but, having presented to the Senate credentials regular in form, showing no objection to his being sworn in upon the face of the certificate, the question is, whether that shall be done.

Under such circumstances the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] objects to the oath being administered, while he admits that the certificate is in due form, does not carry upon its face any suggestion of illegality in the election, and the only authority which he cites is that of the Dubois case, and the very statement he read from the Dubois case was obiter, unnecessary to the decision of the case, and the committee expressly say that it is unnecessary, although they do express an opinion upon it. The case went off upon another point entirely.

In that very case Senator Dubois, upon the presentation of his credentials, was sworn in, and when I ask the Senator from Michigan if he quoted this case upon one point, where it is purely and admittedly obiter, will he not accept it as authority upon one of the very questions upon which its decision rested—that is, the swearing in of the Senator when his credentials are regular and in due form—he says, "Oh, I read it on another point." So he did. But the question for the Senate to decide now is whether it will undertake to go behind the returns, whether it will go dehors the certificate of election in this case, instead of pursuing the usual course when a certificate regular in form comes here from the governor of a sovereign State, and permit the Senator to be sworn in.

In the case of Senator Quay, from Pennsylvania, I voted with the Senator from Michigan, and I regret to say that in this case he is departing from the faith which he counseled at that time. His proposition there was that the legislature should be made to elect the Senator. His proposition here is that technical obstructions and impediments which may be shall be thrown in the way to prevent the legislature of Maryland from filling the vacancy. In the case of Senator Quay, my recollection is that the credentials showed on their face that the legislature had been in session and, having voted ineffectually for months for Senator, adjourned, failing to elect, and thereupon the governor of the State undertook illegally to fill a vacancy which had not occurred during a recess of the legislature.

Mr. President, now on the merits of this law, though a discussion of it is in my judgment premature. It is, of course, mere reiteration to say that sections 14, 16, and 17 of the Revised Statutes have in view three contingencies. One is the election of Senator when there is an expiration of a term or when a State first comes into the Union; second, when there is a vacancy during a recess of the legislature; and third, when there is a vacancy during a session of the legislature. All three of these sections provide that the election shall be held on the second Tuesday after organization, and the last one adds when the legislature "has notice of such vacancy."

Mr. President, in my judgment, the last section—that is, section 17—clearly means that the election may be had at any time after notice of a vacancy, provided the legislature has been organized for the time named in the law; that is, provided it is not earlier than the second Tuesday after the organization of the legislature; that the limitation applies not to notice of the vacancy, but to the time after organization. That is the only proper construction, it seems to me. The recurrence of the idea of time in the three sections with regard to organization bears out that construction.

And, more than that, sir, it can not be implied, construing section 17, that the election shall be had on the second Tuesday after organization and also after notice of a vacancy, because it is almost an impossibility for the two dates to be coincident. So I submit to Senators who have an unbiased judgment on this question that they ought to determine it not upon partisan lines, but as Senators intending to give a true, correct, and permanent construction to the law.

The Senator from Maryland, going further, submits that if this construction of the law shall be wrong, it is nevertheless a directory and not a mandatory provision. In addition to the authority cited by him, I beg to cite a case from Pennsylvania, that of Simon Cameron, in 1857. Senators will remember that the Constitution provides that—

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Mr. President, at the time this case arose the law of the State of Pennsylvania controlled. Afterwards the act of Congress of 1866, now incorporated in the Revised Statutes, superseded all the laws of the States. Let me call the attention of Senators to the decision in this case, when the Committee on Privileges and Elections was composed of Messrs. Butler, Bayard, Toombs, Pugh, Benjamin, Collamer, and Trumbull. If the mind of the Senator from Michigan is still open upon the question, I invite his attention to what is said at page 265:

> It appears from the Journal of the Senate that the appointment of a teller and the nomination of candidates and the communication to the other House of the appointment and nomination so made, all took place on the day of the election, instead of one day previous to the election, as required by the law of the State; but your committee regard this provision of law as purely directory in its nature, and are of opinion that a failure to comply with this formality would under no circumstances suffice to vitiate an election otherwise legal and valid; but where, as in the present case, both houses proceeded without objection from any source to perform their constitutional duty of electing a Senator, the necessity of complying with any particular forms required by law may fairly be considered as waived by common consent, and it is entirely too late, after the result of the voting has been ascertained, to raise a question as to the mode of proceeding.

Mr. President, if all these suggestions shall be unavailing, I appeal to Senators to give the Constitution itself a fair and reasonable construction. The Constitution declares that each State of the Union shall be entitled to two Senators, elected by the legislature thereof, and that action should be taken here which accords with the spirit and purpose of that instrument. The legislature of Maryland has elected a Senator without opposition, without protests, although it seems that efforts were made to secure them. He presents his credentials, regular in form, from the governor of the State, and against this it is insisted that possibly the legislature voted one day or perhaps one week prior to the time fixed by a statute.

In the case of Lapham and Miller, from New York, the Senator from Georgia, Mr. Hill, speaking for a unanimous committee of the Senate, declared that the failure of the legislature in electing Senators to comply with technical and directory provisions of law could not take from the States their constitutional right to be represented in this body. That is the issue which is presented here.

Mr. President, as I said at the outset, it ought to be considered fortunate that this case arises without the environments of a personal contest for the office and without necessity for political advantage to be sought on one side or the other; and I trust Senators will give a fair and a sound construction to the Constitution, so that it may subserve the purpose of the founders, that each State in the Union shall be represented in the Senate by two Senators elected by the legislature, and that obstructions to the election of Senators will not be thrown in the way of legislatures.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURROWS rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BURROWS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think the Senator from Michigan need to yield to me. I think I am entitled to the floor, having first addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado is correct.

Mr. TELLER. I am one of those who believe in maintaining the order and decency of the Senate by the observance of its rules.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has said, this case is presented for our consideration under favorable circumstances. It is not a question of party advantage or party disadvantage in any respect. With a two-thirds vote in the Senate by one political party, no advantage can be had by the admission or exclusion of a member of the other party. And so we ought to approach this question upon principle and precedents. I would not say that in every case where the credentials are proper the Senate is obliged to accept the credentials, but I do say, and I venture it can not be controverted, that in every case which has ever come before the Senate where there were proper credentials, the credentials showing no defects whatever, and where there was not a contesting Senator or an actual protest because of some irregularity in the election, the Senator-elect has been sworn in on a prima facie case. Mr. Turpie, who came here from Indiana, in whose case there was a question whether there had been a legal election or not, was sworn in on motion of Mr. Hoar, who was then chairman of the committee, on a prima facie case; that is, to say on a certificate which did not show any defect. The committee afterwards investigated it and decided that we were compelled to take what the State of Indiana had certified to us was a legal and proper legislative body.

Mr. President, here are the credentials:

> This is to certify that on the 25th day of March, 1908, John Walter Smith was, in accordance with law, duly chosen by the legislature of the State of Maryland, a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the unexpired portion of the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1903, to fill the vacancy caused by the decease of Hon. William Pinkney Whyte.

Mr. President, that presents no question of doubt about the right of the State of Maryland to send here her representative. The attention of the Senate was called to the fact that Mr. Quay's credentials were not accepted. Let me read:

> Whereas, a vacancy exists in the representation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States by reason of the expiration of the constitutional term of the Hon. Matthew S. Quay, and the failure of the general assembly of the Commonwealth to elect his successor.

The facts upon which that was held up are shown in the certificate itself. The Senate had at a previous session declared that the failure of a legislature to elect a successor to an outgoing Senator did not authorize the governor of the State to appoint. That was the law of the Senate, and thereupon that appointment was held up perpetually. The Senate voted in that case, by a very close majority, to adhere to the rule which had been established before that time. It had been established on two or three other occasions away back in the history of the Senate.

Mr. President, the case of Clagett v. Dubois does not present this question in any shape or manner. That was a question whether there had been an organization of the legislature within the meaning of the statute of 1866. The committee, in a very extended report, written by Senator Mitchell, who was a member of the committee at that time, settled that proposition on the theory that whenever a legislature had been sufficiently organized to enact laws it was an organization complying with the statute. That is a very lengthy report. I have not looked it over to see exactly what we said upon this question, but if we said anything it was not one involved in that contest, it was an obiter, and it is not entitled to any consideration.

In the case of Lapham and Miller, there was a protest filed against them. Notwithstanding that protest the certificate was considered sufficient and they were sworn in and subsequently the committee took up that question.

That is the case in which Senator Hill of Georgia made a verbal report for the committee upon this question, and I think perhaps it is worth while to look at it. Will the Senator from Maryland give me the page?

Mr. RAYNER. The Lapham case is on page 697.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to call attention to some things Mr. Hill said in behalf of the committee.

> The memorials set forth five reasons as grounds why these gentlemen should not be allowed to sit here. The first alleges that the legislature did not proceed in separate bodies to vote upon the question until the third Tuesday after notice of the vacancy was communicated by the governor. The facts are such as to create some controversy as to whether they did proceed on the second Tuesday or the third Tuesday after the notice; but, in any view, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that the legislature was not deprived of its constitutional right to elect Senators to this body.
> The second allegation is that at one of the joint sessions of the general assembly a quorum of the State senators was not present. It is not alleged that there was not a quorum present of each body on the days the respective elections took place, but it is alleged or claimed that under the act of 1866 the failure of either body to be present with a quorum on any day deprives the legislature of the right to elect. The committee differ with the memorialists in that view. We think that one body of the legislature could not deprive the legislature of the right to elect by such absence, if unquestionably on the day of the election a quorum of each body of the legislature was present and voting. We think the reason alleged in this ground is not sufficient to invalidate the election.

I think there have been half a dozen cases in the history of the Senate since I have been a Member of it where Senators have been seated here where one House failed to participate in the election. That was certainly true in the case of Mr. Mitchell of Oregon and some others I could mention. Within my own knowledge a legislature has elected a Senator when one body of the legislature did not have a single member in the general assembly, and it was held, as stated here, that one body can not deprive a legislature of a right to elect. I think that shows pretty generally that the committee had the same view the Senator from Maryland has, that it is a directory statute and not an imperative or mandatory statute.

Mr. President, can anyone tell me why the applicant who is here should not be now sworn? There is no one objecting. There is nothing on the face of the proceedings, there is nothing on the record here that I know of to show that the legislature did not comply with the statute of 1866. It seems to me that the presumption ought to be in favor of seating the applicant. I think, as Senator Hoar said in the Turpie case, the certificate is, without a controversy, prima facie evidence of the right of the applicant to be sworn. So it seems to me that the Senator who presents himself here is entitled to be sworn.

I do not myself know of any case which would perhaps cover this exactly in point of fact. It is a construction that might easily be put upon the law. On Tuesday the Senator died, and the legislature is notified, and a week from that day they elect. The controversy is that they ought to have waited another week. The doubt ought to be always resolved in favor of keeping the membership of this body full. To say that they must wait another week is simply to say that the Senate must be without that member for another week; and in this case, as the Senator from Maryland has stated, the legislature by law adjourns. I understand its adjournment is imperative and they have no discretion in the matter. The law has fixed the time of their adjournment and they will be out of existence so far as this session is concerned.

There are a number of cases that have been determined in the Senate, and I think they have always been determined in favor of seating a member in the Senate when there is no real good reason for keeping him out. Of course when I first came into the Senate we had questions arising from the controversies soon after the war in the different sections, and some of those questions were undoubtedly settled both by the Democrats when in power and by the Republicans in power largely from prejudice and party interest and party favor. Here you have not anything of the kind; no harm can come to the Republic; and we may properly give the construction to the statute that was given to it by the legislature, which I am myself inclined to believe is a proper construction, keeping in view the fact that we want to keep the Senate membership intact as far as possible.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, as to the credentials presented in this case, I think there can be no question but that they are in due form and are not subject, on their face, to criticism. But, in determining the right of Mr. Smith under these credentials to a seat in the Senate, the Senate will take cognizance of its own records and its journal entries. The credentials presented showing that Mr. Smith was elected on Wednesday, the 25th of March, and the journal of the Senate disclosing that the vacancy occurred on Tuesday, the 17th of March, the Senate has knowledge of these facts, and it seems to me that the validity of his title is thereby impeached, and that instead of a prima facie case being established in favor of the party holding such credentials, a prima facie case is made out against such right.

I think it will throw some light upon this question by alluding to the history of this legislation. The occasion for the enactment of the statute of 1866 every Senator will recall. Congress exercised its power under that provision of the Constitution referred to first in 1842 by directing the manner in which the Members of the House of Representatives should be elected. Previous to that time the whole membership of the House was elected upon a general ticket, so that whatever divisions there might have been in a State politically the dominant party in the State carried the entire representation. So, in 1842 Congress passed an act under this right to regulate the method of electing Representatives in Congress, declaring that the State should be divided into districts. Then subsequently another act was passed requiring that the election of Members of the House should occur on the same day throughout the United States, so that the practice of colonizing from one State into another on election day should be prevented.

Then came 1866, when this provision was made as to the manner of electing Senators. Previous to that time the legislatures had failed to elect Senators in many instances. One house would act and then the other, and there was no system and no method by which the election could be certainly secured. So Congress sought to regulate the manner of the election of Senators by this provision.

If we turn back to the history of this legislation it throws a flood of light upon the meaning of its provisions, and I think disposes of the contention of Senators on the other side that it was unnecessary to have two weeks elapse after notification before proceeding to fill the vacancy. The act was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary in 1866, a committee composed of Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois; Ira Harris, of New York; Daniel Clark, of New Hampshire; Luke Poland, of Vermont; William M. Stewart, of Nevada; Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, and Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland. That list of names should carry with it the conviction that the act was very carefully framed.

The report of the committee was made on the 9th of July, 1866, and so far as the first and second sections are concerned they were adopted substantially as reported and as they stand to-day. But, coming to the section in controversy, providing for filling a vacancy occurring when the legislature is in session, the committee reported as follows:

> And be it further enacted, That whenever, on the meeting of the legislature of any State, a vacancy shall exist in the representation of such State in the Senate of the United States, said legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after the commencement of its session, to elect a person to fill such vacancy, in the manner hereinbefore provided for the election of a Senator for a full term—

Now I come to the provision under which this contention has arisen—

> and if a vacancy shall happen during the session of the legislature, then on the second Tuesday after the legislature shall have notice thereof.

Can anything be plainer than that? The only amendment——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I inquire from what the Senator is reading?

Mr. BURROWS. I am reading from the report of the Judiciary Committee of 1866, which reported the original draft of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator that the law does not read as the report suggested it should read.

Mr. BURROWS. Of course not. The Senator evidently did not understand me. I am showing how the measure originated and what was its language when reported.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the Senator to be reading from the report to the effect that the law should contain a provision that in case a vacancy occurred during a session of the legislature it should be filled by an election on the second Tuesday after there was notice of it.

Mr. BURROWS. I tried to make myself understood. I said I was reading from the original bill that was reported to the Senate by the committee, the membership of which I have just given. I am reading the bill as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, composed of the gentlemen I have named, with Senator Trumbull as chairman and Reverdy Johnson among the membership. I hold in my hand a copy of the bill that they reported. Am I understood?

Mr. CULBERSON. I think I understood the Senator. I was only suggesting that the law as passed was not in the exact language given in the report.

Mr. BURROWS. Of course not, and I am going to show how the change came about and what the change was. But I am only trying to show now, and I think I shall be able to show——

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. I hope it will have to be only temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——

Mr. BURROWS. I should like to go on, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. CLAY. It is only for a question and for just a minute, with the Senator's permission. I understand the Senator to contend that the election must take place on the second Tuesday after the vacancy occurs. Suppose the legislature is not in session on the second Tuesday after the vacancy occurs, but is in session when the vacancy occurs. The Senator contends that the legislature must elect on the second Tuesday after the vacancy occurs. If it adjourns by law before that time, could the governor appoint a Senator to fill the place?

Mr. BURROWS. That question does not arise here.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the opinion of the Senator on that question.

Mr. BURROWS. The governor could call the legislature together any day.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator contend that neither the legislature that is in session could elect nor that the governor could appoint, but that the governor must call an extra session of the legislature to elect?

Mr. BURROWS. Take the recent case in South Carolina, when Senator Latimer died. The time of the legislature had expired so far as pay was concerned, and the legislature took a recess for a week in order to conform to the statute before the election took place.

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator's contention——

Mr. BURROWS. But, Mr. President, the Senator is taking me away entirely from what I am discussing.

Mr. CLAY. It is in connection with the same question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not, until I complete this statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. BURROWS. I should like to be able——

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to make one statement, not to ask a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BURROWS. Not at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. RAYNER. I wish to correct a mistake in regard to our legislature which the Senator certainly would like to have corrected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. RAYNER. It will take only a minute.

Mr. BURROWS. I prefer not to yield, because I desire to complete my statement.

Mr. RAYNER. I want to say to the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. BURROWS. When I am through I will yield.

Mr. RAYNER. I think the Senator should let me make a statement. It is that the legislature expires by law on Monday night and it can not take a recess. The Senator can not object to my making that statement.

Mr. BURROWS. That has already been stated, and the Senator has already declared that there is nothing in the constitution of Maryland to prevent the governor, to-day, from issuing a proclamation convening the legislature of Maryland next Tuesday.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURROWS. I decline to yield further until I have concluded my statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. BURROWS. Now, Mr. President, as this bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary the provision over which this controversy has arisen read as follows:

> And if a vacancy shall happen during the session of the legislature, then on the second Tuesday after the legislature shall have notice thereof.

Can anyone misunderstand that language? They could not elect until the second Tuesday after notice. Now, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] suggests that it was changed. I know that, and I am going to show the Senate how it was changed and for what reason. But, mark you, there was no change in the bill as to the time of electing on the second Tuesday after notice. Let me read the debate. Mr. Clark in his discussion in the Senate said:

> I move further to amend the bill in the fifth line of the second section by inserting the words "and organization" after the word "commencement."

That is all, "and organization," leaving the balance just as it read, "the second Tuesday after notice."

> Mr. JOHNSON—
> Reverdy Johnson—
> How will it read then?
> Mr. CLARK—
> Quoting—
> "And if a vacancy shall happen during the session of the legislature, then on the second Tuesday after the legislature shall have been organized and shall have notice of the vacancy."

That was the only change, and that is the law as it reads to-day. The only change made by the Senate when the bill was before the Senate declaring that the election should take place on the second Tuesday after notice was to insert the words "and organization," so as to read "organization and notice," for the reason that they could not proceed, of course, until after the legislature was organized.

> Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that that can hardly be necessary. This provision is, "If a vacancy shall happen during the session of the legislature." Is it a "session" of the legislature until it is organized?
> Mr. CLARK. It may be. The legislature may be together and sitting, but not organized. I want to avoid that difficulty.
>
> Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to it.
> Mr. CLARK. I think it would make it a little more specific to insert those words.

That, Mr. President, is the history of this enactment. That is how the amendment "organization" came in, and thus it conforms to the provision of the other sections. Is it contended that because the word "organization" was inserted before the word notice it changed the whole meaning of the section? That can not be possible. The second Tuesday after organization and notice of the vacancy applies with equal force to "notice" as to organization. My contention therefore is that the legislature of Maryland, in proceeding to the election of a Senator on the 25th day of March to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Whyte, which occurred on the 17th day of the same month, acted prematurely and in violation of the statute of 1866.

Mr. President, I have taken occasion to look over the precedents of the Senate since 1866, when this measure was enacted. There have been fourteen deaths in the Senate at a time when the legislature of the State in which the vacancy happened was in session and in not one single instance has any State presumed to defy or ignore this statute and elect until the second Tuesday after they were notified of the vacancy.

The cases are all like the one now pending before the Senate—a death during the session, an election by the legislature after the legislature had been notified and the second Tuesday after such notification—and in no single instance has a Senator been permited to take his seat who has not conformed to that statute.

In the case of George Hearst, of California, who died February 28, 1891, and his successor was elected March 19, 1891, the second Tuesday.

Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, died April 21, 1905, and his successor was elected May 10, 1905.

Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia, died August 16, 1882, and his successor was elected November 15, 1882.

John A. Logan, of Illinois, died December 26, 1886, and his successor was elected January 19, 1887.

James B. Beck, of Kentucky, died May 3, 1890, and his successor was elected May 17, 1890.

Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, died March 11, 1874, and his successor was elected April 17, 1874.

Russell A. Alger, of Michigan, died January 24, 1907, and his successor was elected February 6, 1907.

William J. Sewell, of New Jersey, died December 27, 1901, and his successor was elected January 29, 1902.

Marcus A. Hanna, of Ohio, died February 15, 1904, and his successor was elected March 2, 1904.

Ambrose E. Burnside died September 13, 1881, and his successor was elected October 5, 1881.

William B. Bate, of Tennessee, died March 9, 1905, and his successor was elected March 21, 1905, and the election on the second Tuesday.

John E. Kenna, of West Virginia, died January 11, 1893, and his successor was elected January 25, 1893.

Matthew H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, died February 24, 1881, and his successor was elected March 10, 1881.

Asbury C. Latimer died February 20, 1908, and his successor was elected March 6, 1908.

So in all the cases in every other State where a vacancy has occurred in the representation in the Senate from such State during the session of the legislature that legislature has conformed to the statute and waited before filling the vacancy until the second Tuesday after notice of the vacancy.

Now, I submit, Mr. President, to admit the gentleman holding these credentials to a seat in this body is not only in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, but he has not even a prima facie case which would entitle him to admission. I insist, therefore, to admit Mr. Smith under these circumstances will be to reverse the judgment of the Senate for forty years, overthrow all precedents, and receive into the membership of this body a person under circumstances which can not for one moment, in my judgment, be justified.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, even if I agreed with the construction of the law that has been given by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]—and I am very much inclined to agree with him—it nevertheless is clear to my mind that his contention is premature. It is precisely like arguing that a demurrer to a complaint should be sustained because of facts which the trial itself might disclose and which facts the court happens to know in advance.

It seems to me that at this particular moment there is only one question before the Senate, and that is not the question as to whether the Senator was properly elected, but whether he is entitled to be sworn in; and the question as to whether he is entitled to be sworn in is determined by the regularity of his credentials. The regularity of those credentials no man can question. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], in the lucid and informing remarks which he has just made, said that no man could question the perfection of the credentials on their face.

That facts may exist de hors the credentials themselves does not change their regularity. Those facts when properly examined into, and when the law is correctly applied to them, may show that the Senator was not properly elected, and therefore that his seat must be declared vacant, but that is a question that does not arise at this time.

As I said, it is like insisting that a demurrer to a complaint should be sustained because of facts which may be established in the trial and of which the court might himself have notice. For example—and I think this illustration is very nearly conclusive—suppose the President of the Senate were a court and these credentials were a petition or a complaint of any kind and a demurrer was filed to them as not showing on their face facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court could not say: "Ah, I will sustain this demurrer, because, although the complaint is sufficient on its face, yet I happen to know that on my docket here there appears a fact which hereafter might be produced in evidence which will, if presented, defeat the complainant."

The court is compelled to look at the petition itself, and nothing else. The fact that upon the court record there may be evidence which will defeat the complainant is something which the court, in determining the demurrer to the petition, can not look into. No; the objection to the swearing in of the Senator must be confined solely to defects appearing in the credentials themselves, which the Senator from Michigan, the learned and eminent chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, has himself declared to be perfect.

The questions that have been argued so ably both by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—and I am inclined, with the little information I now have, to agree with them—must arise hereafter upon a trial of the case properly presented, properly examined into. You can not import into the credentials facts which every one of us might know. That is something that questions his title hereafter and does not question the credentials. The credentials themselves, coming from a State in regular and perfect form and presented here by a man who has been elected by that State to fill a vacancy now existing, declare that he was chosen "in conformity to law." Any demurrer to that must point out the defects upon the face of the record, and not depend upon facts which may hereafter be developed when the cause itself is properly and regularly tried.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I only desire to ask the Senator a question. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if the gentleman should present himself at the bar of this Senate with regular credentials signed by the governor of Indiana asserting that he had been elected to the Senate of the United States, would not the Senate take notice of the fact that two Senators representing that State were on the floor, notwithstanding the regularity of the credentials?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly the Senate would take notice that two Senators were already here representing that State; that is just what the Senate would take notice of. There would then be no vacancy; there would be no chair to take; there would be no place to be filled in the case which the Senator from Pennsylvania presents.

Mr. KNOX. But that would not appear upon the face of the credentials.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is not the case here existing. In the case here existing there is a chair vacant.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I certainly do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana, in addition to reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], that these credentials state that there is a vacancy here.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It would be the same thing, because the vacancy would exist. The Senator from Pennsylvania presents what was once called by a very eminent lawyer upon this floor "an unimaginable case."

Now, Mr. President, we come to the most serious phase of this whole question. I shall never forget so long as I live the wonderful argument made by the then senior Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Hoar, upon what he called the sacred right of a State to full representation in this body—a right which should not be lightly waived aside upon any technicality; but that where even in any Senator's mind a multitude of doubts should exist it was his duty to resolve those doubts in favor of a full representation of every State in the Senate. The Constitution of the United States declares that each State shall be represented by two Senators, and that each Senator shall have one vote. What is here proposed, in objecting to the swearing in of the Senator, is that a million two hundred thousand people shall be partially disfranchised so far as——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TELLER. If it would not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not at all; I am about through, anyway, and shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, I desire to read a resolution offered by a former Senator from Indiana, Governor Morton, whom, I am glad to say, I knew very well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. TELLER. That resolution reads:

Resolved, That the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback for a seat in the Senate of the United States for six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1873, being in regular form, he is entitled under the law, and in conformity with the usages of the Senate, to be sworn in as a member; and that whatever ground of contest there may be as to his right to a seat should be made thereafter.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Quite so. Mr. President, in those words which I am obliged to the Senator from Colorado for reading—which are from what we all in Indiana love to think is one of the greatest minds this country every produced and certainly one of its greatest patriots—Governor Morton states, with a brevity equaled only by its force and authority, what I have been trying here to feebly state. It may hereafter, when the case is tried, when the pleadings are filed, and the issues are made up, be a question upon which we may have some dispute. There has been a construction of the law presented here by both sides with ability; but the single question now before us is, whether on those credentials themselves—which the Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, has admitted are regular—the Senator who has presented himself to fill this vacancy which now exists shall be deprived of the privilege of having the oath of office administered, and thereby 1,200,000 people of a State in this Union be partially disfranchised. I think it entirely too serious a matter, and I recall the statement of several veteran Senators here, that never in their long experience have they seen any Senator presenting credentials that were perfect on their face, refused permission to take the oath of office. So far as my vote is concerned, I shall certainly vote that the Senator be sworn in.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, very little can be contributed, I think, to this discussion. The very lucid and forceful way in which the matter has been presented on both sides I think will enable the Senate to reach a conclusion without much more debate. However, as I have no doubt at all in my mind about the construction of this statute or about my duty under the circumstances, I feel constrained to say a word or two in explanation of my position.

I think it is most fortunate, as several of the Senators have mentioned, that we may decide this question as a pure question of law, uninfluenced by anything else whatever. It is most fortunate also that it does not matter how this question shall be determined, it will not in the slightest degree affect the political fortunes of the gentleman whose credentials have been presented.

Mr. President, I do not propose to make any reference to the so-called precedents that have been established or suggested and referred to from prior election cases, except that I want to say, in respect to the case of Senator Quay, that when my colleague [Mr. PENROSE] presented Senator Quay's credentials he did in that case what I think he should have done, and that is, as a question of law was raised and it appeared upon the face of the credentials, he did not ask that Senator Quay should be sworn in, but allowed the question of law to be referred to the committee, as there were some questions of fact to be considered in connection with the question of law.

I think is is a kindness to the gentleman who holds these credentials, I think it is a kindness to the State of Maryland, and I think it is a duty that we owe to ourselves, if this question has been fairly, squarely, and properly raised, for us to decide it fearlessly and promptly. What is the necessity of postponing its consideration? What is the necessity of referring it to a committee? The committee is a mere machine, or a part of the machinery, for the transaction of the business of the Senate. What additional facts could the committee bring to the Senate of which it is not now already fully possessed? There is but one question in this case, and that question is, Did the legislature of Maryland act upon the second Tuesday after it received notice of the death of Senator Whyte?

Mr. President, it seems to me that there is no doubt whatever as to the construction of this statute. It was made perfectly clear by the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ought to have asked the question earlier. The Senator asked what is the use of delay; why refer anything to a committee? When a demurrer to a complaint is filed, and as a matter of fact the court knows the facts and everybody else knows the facts, but the case has not been tried, the question could be asked, What is the use of referring this case to a jury to try the facts or to the court to hear it? We know it all now.

Mr. KNOX. I think, Mr. President, that the Senator is most unfortunate in his reference to a proceeding in court. The Senate is the absolute, uncontrolled judge of this matter. No other authority or no other power on earth can intervene between us and the decision of the question of the qualification of anyone who presents himself here for admission to this body.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator this question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course everybody concedes that that is so under the clause of the Constitution that the Senate is the judge, and so forth, but if every question is to be determined by the Senate the moment anybody raises it, what is the use of having a standing Committee on Privileges and Elections at all, and if we should investigate the facts in one case in a regular manner, why not in another case in a regular manner, even though we all know what they may be in one instance and do not in another?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I will come in just a moment to reply to the question suggested by the Senator from Indiana. It is perfectly foolish for the Senate to stop and consider a thing that is openly admitted upon the floor of the Senate to be the fact if it raises a question that we must ultimately deal with. We have, upon the face of the credentials presented, the statement that Senator Smith was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Whyte. We have it upon the face of the record that Senator Whyte died upon a particular day, and we certainly can take notice of the flight of time between the date of the death of Senator Whyte and the date specified upon the credentials as the date when Mr. Smith was elected. So that I say, Mr. President, that every single fact that bears upon this question is in full possession of the Senate.

I only want to say one word as to the section of the Revised Statutes that has been referred to. It was made perfectly clear by the distinguished chairman of the committee that as that bill was originally reported to the Senate it only provided for one thing, namely, that when a vacancy shall occur during the session of the legislature the legislature shall proceed on the second Tuesday after notice of the vacancy to elect a successor. When the bill with that provision in it was reported to the Senate, the Senate said, "Nay; there is one thing yet that we must provide, and that is that the legislature under such circumstances must have been organized." So an amendment was inserted, and the law as it stands now provides that two things must concur—first, that the legislature must be duly organized, and second, that its action must follow not earlier than the second Tuesday after notice of the fact of death.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. If the Senator will allow me to correct him, there is no such provision as two weeks' notice.

Mr. KNOX. I beg pardon. That was a slip of the tongue. I mean the second Tuesday.

Now, Mr. President, as to the precedents that have been referred to, where the legislature has acted after the second Tuesday and the inference to be drawn from those precedents that the words are not mandatory, but directory, I take this view of that proposition, that the statute can be construed so that the words preventing action before the second Tuesday are mandatory as to everything that might occur prior to the second Tuesday and only directory in respect to that which might follow. In that respect such a construction would follow very closely many rules that lawyers are entirely familiar with in reference to the dates fixed for pleadings, notice, and so forth, in litigation.

Therefore, Mr. President, in conclusion, I say that, in my judgment, this is the proper time and the proper place to decide this question, and it is only a kindness to the State of Maryland and to the gentleman who has presented his credentials here that we should do so.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] summoned me to explain something that appeared in the case of Claggett v. Dubois, where in one place the date was given as "Tuesday, December 9," and then on the next page, page 787, "Tuesday, December 18." I venture to say that it appears on the face of the record that that is a misprint. I do not mean, when I say that, that the record itself states that it is a misprint. I mean it appears in the record, as anyone can see who will take the trouble to turn to the page where it is stated with the greatest care by the committee, that the legislature met on the 8th; that Tuesday, December 9, was the first Tuesday, and on Tuesday the 16th they voted, and there was no election; that on Wednesday, the 17th, they voted again and there was no choice, and that on the 18th, Thursday, as is set forth on the next page, Mr. Dubois was chosen. Mr. President, I think that makes it clear that this is a misprint, and I do not think it is worth while to found a very serious argument on a grave question like this on a misprint in an old document.

I was led into this debate without any intention of taking part in it by merely asking a question in regard to the case of Senator Quay, which I remember very well, indeed. He did not take the oath, as has been stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. My contention is that it no more appeared on the face of the credentials of Senator Quay that there was an irregularity than it appears on the face of the credentials of Mr. Smith. The fact that a credential——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Has the Senator read that credential?

Mr. LODGE. The credential of Senator Quay?

Mr. TELLER. Yes. Let me read it to the Senator. I think he has overlooked a fact. It reads:

> Whereas a vacancy exists in the representation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States by reason of the expiration of the constitutional term of the Hon. Matthew Stanley Quay and the failure of the general assembly of the Commonwealth to elect his successor.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I am aware those words are there.

Mr. TELLER. That is where the defect was apparent on the face of the credentials.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was one of those—and there were a very large number of us in the Senate, both on that case and in the Lee Mantle case—who did not think that was a defect, although the Senate decided otherwise, and I still think decided wrongly and unfortunately. It did not appear on its face that there was any flaw in that title, any more than it appears on the face of the title here. This credential presented to-day has become part of our records, and it appears by the date of that credential and by the statement that it is to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Whyte; that it relates to that death. The date of that death appears on our record, and the credential is part of the record. It appears, therefore, on the face of the credential that there is an irregularity.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Suppose a petition is presented in a court of equity and it appears upon the court records on the next page that facts exist which will make that petition unavailing, would any court in the United States throw it out because the judge happened to know from the record itself that such facts existed?

Mr. LODGE. This is not a court or an equity proceeding.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is exactly a court in a question of this kind.

Mr. LODGE. This is the Senate of the United States trying an election case, of which it is the sole judge. The courts are supposed to take judicial cognizance of certain facts, and the Senate can be assumed to take judicial cognizance of its own record and of things in it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him just a moment there, I wish to say that when the Senator said the Senate is not a court, of course he at once refuted that statement—and I think he would modify it now—by stating that we are trying an election case of which the Senate is the judge. In a matter of this kind the Senate is a court. No court on earth, no chancellor on earth, can take judicial cognizance of something appearing on its own records in determining as to the sufficiency of a petition.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senate is not sitting as a court, if the Senator will excuse my saying so. It is sitting as the Senate of the United States to try the right and to decide the right of an applicant for a seat in the Senate. The Senate sits as a court only when it sits in the trial of impeachments.

Mr. President, to repeat what I have already said, I think it appears as plainly on the face of this credential as it did on the face of the credential of the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Quay, that there is a flaw under the law regulating the manner in which Senators shall be chosen.

Mr. President, no one can value the principle of the representation of a State more than I. That was the basic principle on which I, in company with many excellent lawyers in this Senate, sustained—and I still believe correctly—the proposition that a governor has the right to appoint under certain conditions. I feel in the fullest degree the importance of a State having its full and entire representation in the Senate at all times. This is not a question of disfranchising 1,200,000 people, or any number of people; it is a question of whether one legislature in this country can violate the statutes of the United States, which no other legislature, so far as our records show, has ever attempted to disregard. I think it is of the extremist importance that legislatures should scrupulously observe the statutes, and in this case it is perfectly clear to my mind—I need not go over the argument—that the statute has been disregarded. I think that we are as absolutely entitled to pass upon this prima facie case, and to pass upon it now, as we can be at any other time, and we have the fullest possible power to do so.

I do not agree with the proposition of the Senator from Maryland, that because it was held—and held rightly, I think—that the question of the right of two members of the senate of Indiana to their seats was to be determined solely by the senate of that State, it therefore follows that this Senate is estopped from considering what is the second Tuesday after a given event because the legislature of Maryland happens to differ from it. I think that our action is conclusive as to the right of an applicant to a seat in this body.

Mr. President, my sole interest in this subject is that the statutes of the United States in a matter of this vast importance should be religiously observed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when a law does not agree with my ideas of justice in a particular case I shall not attempt in any way to make that law read differently from what it actually does read, but rather content myself under a given condition to change that law. I can not by any law of construction make the section of the Revised Statutes read any other way than that there must be a second Tuesday elapse after the notice of death, nor can I agree with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] that we can ignore what our records plainly and distinctly show, any more than we can ignore the days of the week or the days of the month.

The time which elapsed between the death of Senator Whyte and the election of his successor was not sufficient to comply with the direct terms of this law, and I conceive it to be our duty to consult our records, even in the face of credentials that are absolutely fair; and, as has already been suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the fact that Maryland may have two Senators already serving and a third one is elected, and that the credentials are fair upon their face, would not justify us in refusing to take cognizance of the fact that she already has two Senators. Nor do I believe for one moment that we can ignore the facts that appear upon the records of the Senate as to the time of the death.

But, Mr. President, as has been suggested, the Senate is a law unto itself in determining the right of any member to a seat. I voted against the seating of Mr. Quay not only upon what I considered constitutional grounds, but I also considered that to admit him would create a precedent that would be absolutely pernicious. I did not think that a situation where any number of members of a legislature could prevent an election during the life of the session of the legislature and throw the matter over to the governor could possibly appeal to us as a just and fair proposition, which would be a safe precedent for the American Senate. So I voted against Mr. Quay. I know there were many Senators who took the opposite view, as did the Senator from Massachuetts, and I have no doubt that the deep friendships in favor of Senator Quay may have influenced many to vote in favor of admitting him to a seat in the Senate at that time, and they may have been justified in their course.

This case presents no such condition. The legislature of the State of Maryland has had an opportunity to elect a United States Senator. It has elected one, and he is before the Senate asking for his seat in accordance with the certificate which has been presented from the officials of the State.

The matter of refusing him admission is based upon this law.

It was enacted for the reason that it was desirable to give time for the legislators to consider the candidacy of any person for whom they were liable to vote. I know of no other object for which it could have been enacted.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Had the vote been taken one or two or three days later, I do not understand that any question whatever would have arisen. To me, therefore, it appears as a mere technicality, without any good reason for refusing the admission at this time. If I vote in favor of seating the man elected by that legislature, it will be a vote to change existing law, so far as it affects this particular case, and the demands of justice are sufficient to me to incline my vote in favor of the admission.

Now, a special session, it is true, might be called, but the special session undoubtedly would require notice. It would cause much expense to the State. If the constitution of Maryland is like the constitution of most of the other States in the Union, from ten to thirty days' notice would have to be given before a special session of the legislature could be convened. It would be expensive, and no different result is liable to follow in case a special session is called. This being the case, Mr. President, I feel it my duty to vote, and I feel that I am fully justified in voting, to amend the law as it now stands in favor of equal and exact and proper justice being meted out to this man; that he be sworn in at the present time and be allowed to take his seat.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the legislature is called in extra session for the purpose of electing a United States Senator, would it not have to remain in session, without doing anything, for fifteen days before it could elect, according to the contention here?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is probably true.

Mr. RAYNER. At an expense of forty or fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it seems as if this controversy turned, so far as the merits of the case are concerned, upon the interpretation of the statute which it is suggested that the legislature of Maryland has violated in making this selection of a Senator; and when I examine the statute I think that that controversy is not sustained. I have listened with great interest to the precedents offered by the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have listened to the discussion with regard to the colloquy or the conversations which occurred between the members of the Judiciary who first drew and submitted this statute; but I think that the statute itself should be allowed to speak for itself and not be controlled by conversations which took place in committee rooms, and especially when the statute uses different language from that which is quoted by the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator will allow me to state that the conversation referred to was not a conversation in the committee room, but on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Debate.

Mr. OWEN. It amounts to the same thing. It is the expression of personal opinion that did not find itself recorded in the language of the law. The statute speaks for itself, and when the chairman finds it necessary to bolster his contention with these precedents of fourteen different cases I call the attention of the Senate to the fact, and the interesting fact, that, regardless of the opinion of legislatures with regard to this statute, it would hardly ever occur that a legislature would show such dispatch as to dispose of a matter of this importance within seven or eight days, and therefore since these legislatures may well have acted without regard to the interpretation of this statute their action constitutes no valid argument in interpreting the statute itself.

I call the attention of the Senate to the language of the statute, section 17:

> Whenever during the session of the legislature of any State a vacancy occurs in the representation of such State in the Senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized.

And this language is found in section 16 and in section 14, but the words that immediately follow occur only in section 17, and those words are:

> And has notice of such vacancy.

It does not say "and has had notice." It is merely equivalent to the language "with notice of such vacancy;" and no one challenges the proposition that this legislature had been organized for more than eight days previous to the election. But the contention turns upon the point that the word "after" qualifies their notice of such vacancy, and the language of the statute does not require that interpretation. You may give it that interpretation by inserting the word "had" after the word "has." You may give it that interpretation by a somewhat forced construction, and granting that it may be so construed without a forced construction, it at least is equivocal. It may be interpreted either way. Since the Senate has the power and the right to determine the validity of these credentials, and since there is no violation of the statute necessarily involved in this case; and since the cause of justice requires that the State of Maryland be allowed to record its will and be represented on this floor, I shall vote not only to admit the Senator-elect from Maryland, but if it comes up afterwards I shall maintain that it is his right to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I rose when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] was speaking to ask him a question, but I did not get recognition. The Senator from North Dakota, if I understood aright his interpretation of this law, suggested that probably the second Tuesday was fixed so that the legislature might have a proper time to canvass the merits of the candidates. In my opinion, that never entered into the consideration of anybody in the framing of this law. If the Senator will read the history of this legislation he will find it was, like most all legislation that is passed, amended after it was originally framed. There were amendments interpolated into the text of it on the floor of the Senate, and the chairman of the committee has brought that fact to the attention of the Senate.

This bill was passed at a time when, perhaps, the most difficulty was experienced in our method of electing United States Senators in our history. As to the immediate cause of this bill, I will give just one illustration. Mr. Fessenden was elected eighteen times to the United States Senate by one body of his State legislature, and never was elected in those eighteen times by the other body of the legislature. One body was of one political faction and the other of another political faction, and they never did agree when they should get together under the laws of their State to elect a United States Senator. That had been the trouble for a number of years. It had not only occurred to Mr. Fessenden. It had occurred in a good many other States and on a good many other occasions, and for quite a time there had been debate and discussion as to the advisability of Congress going further than the Constitution had gone and saying specifically when a State should elect its United States Senator. It did it not only for uniformity, but it did it so as to be certain that the States would elect United States Senators.

The matter was referred to this committee, and they brought out the bill originally as the chairman of the committee has suggested, providing in this particular case that on the second Tuesday after the legislature shall have notice of a vacancy they shall proceed to elect. All the way through the bill it provided the second Tuesday after the meeting of the legislature. When the bill came into the Senate, Mr. Clark moved to insert, after the word "meeting," the words "and organization," and the debate shows that some contended that in some cases that it would be impossible to do so by the second Tuesday after the meeting. Mr. Clark cited some illustrations where the second Tuesday after meeting had found some legislatures not organized, and he further said "you can not get this vote cast at a certain time with reference to the beginning of the session because you can not force anything until the legislature is organized and in position to do business, and so you must put it 'after the organization.'"

So the law was not made, as the Senator from North Dakota says, for the purpose of giving time to investigate the candidates, but to fix a time after the legislature should be in operation, with power to enforce the attendance of its members, when a vote would certainly be had. Hence they put in the words "after organization."

That is not a very material point except as to this: I was very much interested in the address of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I want to say to him that on the general results of this proposition I am with him. It was a very ingenious argument that the Senator made, and certainly a very attractive one, as are all his addresses before the Senate. But the Senator is radically wrong in his contention that time is not the essence of this statute. It was made for that particular purpose. Time was the essence. It is absolutely mandatory for the reasons I have set forth; and that is why I undertook to answer the statement of the Senator from North Dakota.

The time was to be the second Tuesday after organization, and no other time. That is when they must meet. That is when they must take the first action with reference to this matter. Why? Because then they are directed when both houses shall meet. It was to overcome the difficulty they had for many years, in the early sixties, of one body of the legislature meeting one day and another body of the legislature meeting another day, or one body never meeting at all. They could not get them together under the State laws in some States for a joint ballot. They could not get one house to act with the other on a joint ballot, or something of that sort. One house would agree to a joint ballot on one day and the other would not, and there was all that sort of thing. So the Congress of the United States, to overcome that difficulty, passed that law, and it went much further than the Constitution and provided specifically the day when that thing must be done.

Now, in the debate that was had on the bill there was a good deal of discussion as to whether or not Congress had the power, for instance, to provide how they should vote; whether they should vote viva voce or by ballot. That question was raised and voted upon, and it was determined that in so far as Congress was concerned it did have the right to provide when they should vote and how they should vote; and the Senate voted on that particular thing.

I have heard a good deal of controversy as to when is the seventh day and when is the first day of the week; and it is going on now. All Senators, I suppose, are getting many communications. As a member of the District Committee, I am getting, I think, about twenty-five or thirty letters a day, telling me about the importance of the first day or the seventh day, and in respect to legislation about the first day and the seventh day.

Now, this whole question to-day revolves around whether last Tuesday was the second Tuesday or the first Tuesday after the legislature of the State of Maryland was advised of Senator Whyte's death. For my part I am not going to quarrel about it. The legislature has decided when it was, so far as it is concerned, and the result that the Congress intended by this law has been accomplished—harmonious action and the election of a Senator. It is the only case of the kind that has occurred in the history of the Senate. There will probably never be another case where a Senator dies on Tuesday and the election takes place under these circumstances. We are not making a precedent, therefore, that will ever rise up against us, and certainly there is no trouble in this particular case. It will not occur one time in a million. It is the first case of its kind in a hundred years in the history of the country. For my part I am going to take the view that the legislature of the State of Maryland took. They knew that Senator Whyte was dead two Tuesdays. That constituted the second Tuesday, and they elected his successor on that Tuesday.

This law had just one object, and that was to get elections of United States Senators and prevent filibustering, and it has accomplished in this case just exactly what the law was originated and designed to accomplish. And for my part I do not propose to sit here and quibble on a technicality, whether it is the first Tuesday or the second Tuesday, and defeat the accomplishment of a thing sought to be accomplished by that statute. So I am willing in my vote to follow the opinion of the legislature of Maryland in this matter and say that they did know of Senator Whyte's death two Tuesdays.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, before I submit my motion I wish to say a few words. I think we had better understand exactly the question before the Senate. The question before the Senate is not the question which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] submitted at all. The question before the Senate is whether the Senator-elect from Maryland shall be sworn in. That is the only question before the Senate. It does not preclude the Senate or any member of the Senate or any member of the committee with reference to any subsequent proceeding that may take place or in regard to any report that may come from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Senator from Pennsylvania wants to put this question in a way in which it never yet has been put before the Senate that I know of. If there is any such case, I shall be glad to have it presented. The Senator from Pennsylvania says to take up the case and decide it now finally, not send it to the committee at all, not let the committee act upon it or hear any further arguments upon it, but just upon the presentation of a motion to swear in a Senator that the Senate shall consider the whole question, abandon the motion, and consider something that is not before the Senate. I object to that plan, Mr. President.

The motion here is that the Senator shall be sworn. As I say, that does not preclude any further inquiry into the case. The Senator from Pennsylvania says we have had full inquiry. It does not follow that we have had a full inquiry. The Senator-elect is entitled to be represented if he wants to before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The idea of the Senate determining that this seat is vacant without giving the claimant even a right to appear before the committee, to be represented in person or by counsel, is tyrannical. Therefore I do not accede to that view at all. The Senator from Pennsylvania says that we ought to determine it here and now upon the arguments made, two or three arguments upon each side, and evidently made—although I confess I have said about all I can say upon the subject—without any extended investigation by those who have participated in the discussion, and by two-thirds of the Senators—or four-fifths of them, perhaps—with no examination at all.

If the Senate rejects these credentials it will be the first case in the history of the Senate where the Senate has refused to permit a Senator to be sworn in upon the face of his credentials where the credentials were regular. If there is any other case I should like to hear of it. There is not another case. All these citations of cases, where there was no dispute, amount to nothing. You might as well in trying a case in court cite as authorities a lot of cases that have never been tried. No one of the cases which the Senator from Michigan cited was ever brought before the Senate. There is not a contested case which he has cited.

I have given two cases here in which the Senate has decided that where the proceedings were initiated on the third Tuesday, which is not in entire accord with what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] said, although I am very glad he has reached the result he has in his own mind, because I do not care what his line of reasoning is if he is going to vote for the Senator-elect from Maryland—but in both those cases the Senate held that the statute was directory; that was in Miller's case and in the Florida case. In the case of Hart and Miller the proceedings were not commenced—the Senator from Michigan overlooked that part of the statement—on the second Tuesday, but on the third Tuesday, and the Senate held it made no difference whether they were commenced on the second or the third Tuesday; that the statute was only directory.

I do not go as far as that. It is not necessary. I say the second Tuesday must elapse after organization. I am perfectly willing to admit that that part is mandatory; that it must be the second Tuesday after the organization of the legislature; but I will never admit that the second Tuesday clause comes into this provision with respect to notice, and before you refuse the Senator from Maryland his rights you have to interpolate those words into the provision as to notice, that two Tuesdays must elapse after notice, when there are no such words in the statute.

It is all right to talk about the reports of committees. We all know that the courts, in an unbroken line of cases, have declined in the construction of statutes to be entirely governed by antecedent matters connected with the legislation. They have taken the view of course that the statute merged the proceeding. You may find the report of the committee one way and you may find the law another way. The law merges the proceedings, and the antecedent proceedings do not always enlighten us in the construction of the law. We are not to decide this case upon any proceedings that took place before the passage of the law.

The filing of the bill, the discussion in the committee room, the reports of the committee are all gone when the law is passed, and the question is not how will you construe those proceedings, but how will you construe the law, and here is the law providing for notice, without saying one word to the effect that two Tuesdays must elapse after the notice is given.

Mr. BURKETT. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me a question? He says that in this case the second Tuesday does not have any reference to the time of the death, but only refers to the second Tuesday after the organization. Supposing in this case one house of the legislature of Maryland had been one way and the other house had been the other way with reference to the election of a Senator, and they had not come together, that one wanted to set one day for the election of a Senator and the other another. Suppose one of the houses had determined to sit the next day, and the other house had agreed to sit two or three days later on for the election of a Senator. What would have been the result if this statute is not to provide the time when they must get together and vote?

Mr. RAYNER. If the legislature proposes not to elect a Senator, it must take the responsibility. If the legislature does not elect, it must take the result. My construction is that the second Tuesday must elapse after organization. It is impossible for me to change my mind about that. But it has nothing whatever to do with notice. They can proceed the day after they get the notice.

I want to announce to the Senate the situation we are in in Maryland. Our constitution provides that the general assembly may continue its sessions so long as, in its judgment, the puplic interest may require, for a period not more than ninety days. The time of our general assembly expires on Monday night at 12 o'clock. Therefore we can not elect any member of the United States Senate. It would be impossible for us to do it. It would be utterly impossible for the general assembly of Maryland to comply with the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan.

This case might not occur again within a long time, because the death of Senator Whyte took place on Tuesday. If it had taken place on Monday, this case would not have arisen. We have not defied any law of Congress or anything of that sort. We have done the very best we could. We could not do anything else. There was nothing else for us to do, because there is no other Tuesday that intervenes so as to entitle us to have an election. The undivided sentiment of our State is against calling an extra session for reasons that it is not necessary for me to enter into now. There is a protest from every part of our State, not only in my own party, but from the Republican party and from independent sources all through the State, againt an extra session. It would incur a useless expense of $30,000 to $40,000, and they would be kept in session fifteen days absolutely doing nothing, to settle a technicality, if you can dignify it by that name.

There is no contestant here; there is no protest. You establish no precedent by letting the Senator-elect be sworn in. There is not a single precedent, as I pointed out to the Senator from Michigan, that is established. If the Senator-elect from Maryland is now sworn in, your committee can take up this question, and if you want to declare the seat vacant you can take it up and have a full discussion in the committee, and let us have a full discussion in the Senate.

In none of the cases the Senator from Michigan has cited has the event happened in the manner that this event did, because here the Senator happened to die on a Tuesday which does not permit two Tuesdays to intervene before the adjournment of a legislature.

In not a single case that is cited has that been the case. The whole question here is whether this shall be done in view of the fact that there never has been a Senator rejected here whose credentials were all right. The Senator from Colorado knows as much about these matters as any man in this body, and he agrees with me. Furthermore, he has stated that the only case that has been cited—the case from Pennsylvania—was one where the irregularity upon the credentials of Senator Quay appeared upon the face of the credentials.

Mr. President, we had better be a little careful about this matter. It is not a party question. It is not a question of supporting the dignity of the committee, because your committee has made no report. It is not a question of sustaining the opinion of the honored chairman of that committee, because he has never had the case in hand to make an official report to the Senate. He simply has given his views upon the construction of a statute and, admitting now that his construction is right, there is no reason on this earth why every precedent should be disregarded and the Senator-elect from Maryland should be the first Senator rejected upon the face of perfectly proper credentials in accordance with the statutes of the United States.

I do not think that some members of the Senate fully appreciate the situation. You have never yet rejected a Senator where his credentials were in proper form. You have never yet collaterally impeached the certificate of a Senator by proceedings dehors the certificate. It has never been done.

All I ask for here is the exercise of a prima facie right. I am not asking the Senate to determine this question. A man may vote to-day to let the Senator-elect be sworn and vote to-morrow to have his seat vacated, and there is no conflict between his votes. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], who will vote to seat him, may, when the report comes in from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, vote to unseat him, and he is not bound by anything he has said. He will then be able to examine into the merits. But now the whole question is as to the prima facie right of the Senator-elect to be sworn.

The Senator from Michigan is mistaken. He has no precedents. There is no precedent. Give me a single precedent where a Senator appeared at the bar of the Senate with proper credentials and was rejected. If you do I will ask the Senator-elect from Maryland to leave this presence. There is no such case. I have cited an unbroken line of cases—and the Senator from Michigan has not referred to them, and the Senator from Massachusetts has not referred to them, and no one has re-referred to them—where in every single instance the Senator-elect was sworn and the question came up afterwards upon its merits.

I say, follow your precedents. It does not bind you. It does not conclude you. The question then, upon the motion of any Senator who so desires it, as it was done upon the motion of Senator Hoar and other Senators in these cases, will be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Senator from Maryland will have the right to appear there by counsel, if such a proceeding should occur.

Mr. President, I think this question is of great concern. You are attempting to do a serious thing. You are denying to a State the constitutional right of representation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will simply say to the Senator that that may be what has been proposed, but it has not been done here, and I think the Senator will find that the entire gravity and importance of this situation is entirely appreciated. I am heartily with the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. I understand that. I am very much obliged to you. I am trying to get votes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was informing the Senator that he has some votes on both sides.

Mr. RAYNER. I have some, but I want a few more. I feel the overwhelming work that is on me as a Senator from Maryland, and the State is entitled to two Senators. I think every State is entitled to two Senators. I would leave his Hall before I voted to reject a man on proper credentials from a State. I would say "the State elected you, and now be sworn; and let the committee go into an inquiry about it, if an inquiry is demanded."

The point the Senator from Michigan makes is a mere technicality. It is, in other words, that we must make the inquiry before the Senator-elect is sworn, and not after he is sworn. Why not let this proposition go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and when the Senator who is sworn appears before the committee have the question there decided, if necessary?

I wish to say in conclusion that the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts have not cited a case to contravene the unbroken line of cases where if the credentials of a Senator are proper he is sworn. That is all that I ask.

My motion before the Senate is nothing further than that. I move that the credentials of John Walter Smith, Senator-elect from the State of Maryland, be taken from the table and that he be sworn. Then, after he is sworn, the Senator from Michigan can make a motion that his credentials be referred, as in all those cases it was done, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if he so desires. Any other proceeding, Mr. President, would be the gravest injustice, gratuitously inflicted upon a sovereign State that has the right of its constitutional representation in the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I think I appreciate fully, as the Senate does, the importance of the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Michigan allow the motion to be stated?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland moves that the credentials of John Walter Smith, Senator-elect from the State of Maryland, be taken from the table, and that he be sworn.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I was saying that I appreciate the importance of this question and the very grave importance of making a mistake in the matter. I feel as though the matter ought to be considered by a committee before action is taken. I therefore offer a substitute resolution for the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan offers a resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of John Walter Smith, claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Maryland, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BURROWS. I will say in this connection that if the resolution prevails I will call a meeting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections at once, to-morrow, to consider the matter, and I promise the Senate an early report.

Mr. RAYNER. As far as I am concerned that will not suit me, and it will not suit my State, and it will not suit anybody. Suppose we go into this question to-morrow, and have a meeting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections called, the Senator-elect certainly must be given time to prepare his case. Why is there this tremendous urgency in the case? Why is the Senator from Michigan, without a protest or a contestant, proposing to do in this case what has never been done before? You want us to enter into a discussion of this very important matter before the Committee on Privileges and Elections before the case is ready for presentation? It might never be reported, and then it might be reported after the legislature of Maryland has adjourned and thus compel the governor to call an extra session.

Mr. BURROWS. It does not make any difference whether it is determined by the committee votes on Saturday or next Monday, so far as the legislature is concerned. The governor of your State can call an extra session of the legislature for next Monday, before the members of the legislature leave the capital of the State, and they can elect a Senator a week from next Tuesday. But I do not care to discuss the matter further.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I propose to say a word.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wished merely to say if the Committee on Privileges and Elections were willing to act upon the case this afternoon or to-night or to-morrow or at any other time at this particular juncture, the Senator-elect has a right upon his credentials, the regularity of which no man questions, to be sworn in. The next hour we might take up this question and try it in the regular way and exclude the Senator-elect. But upon the only question now pending before the Senate, the right of the Senator-elect to be sworn upon regular credentials, he has that right, no matter if we were to vote to exclude him in an hour.

Mr. BURROWS. I want to say in reply to the Senator from Indiana that I have not yet forgotten the contention of the Senate that when a member is once sworn in it will take a two-thirds vote to dispossess him.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Michigan is mistaken about that. There will not be an expulsion. If you decide against the Senator-elect from Maryland, the seat is vacant ab initio, and the question of expulsion does not enter into it at all.

Mr. BURROWS. I suppose the Senator from Maryland can not speak for the Senate.

Mr. RAYNER. I can speak for the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. I have offered my resolution as a substitute, and I ask for a vote on it.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, just a moment. I want to state the proposition. There is no occasion for expulsion. If the Senator from Maryland was not elected, his seat is vacant. It is not a question of doing any act. The case from Utah presents no parallel. The governor of our State has been advised by the attorney-general of the State, one of the best-read lawyers in the State, and he has been advised by almost every leading lawyer in our State—and we have as good a bar almost as there is in the country; they are the peers of any other bar in any other State—and the uniform opinion is that the action of the legislature was regular and that the governor is right about it and ought not to be called upon to call an extra session. These men have examined it, and he has acted under their advice. Every leader of the Maryland bar, without having any interest in it at all, has advised him to proceed in the way he has, and acting on their advice he has proceeded. The question is whether the Senator-elect will be rejected.

Mr. BURROWS. On the resolution I have offered as a substitute I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let me understand the proposition. The Senator from Maryland offers a motion that the Senator-elect be sworn. The Senator from Michigan proposes as a substitute to send the credentials to the committee and to vote down the proposition that the Senator-elect be sworn now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the effect of it. The resolution to commit takes precedence. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again announce the illness of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which renders his absence necessary, and of my general pair with him. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and not knowing how he would vote if present, I will withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], who is detained from the Chamber by illness. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAY. My colleague [Mr. BACON] is absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. Were my colleague present he would vote "nay."

Mr. KEAN. My colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] is necessarily absent. I understand he is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. RAYNER (after having voted in the negative). I thought the pair was on the currency bill, but if the Senator from New Jersey says it is on all legislation, I will withdraw my vote. I stated distinctly the currency bill, but if it is the impression——

Mr. KEAN. I would be very glad if the Senator should arrange a pair so that he can vote.

Mr. RAYNER. I will let my pair with the Senator from New Jersey stand, if that is the understanding, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state, generally, that Senators on this side of the Chamber have general pairs, in some cases with Senators on the other side, and I am inclined to think that some of those Senators have voted. I do not invite attention to it except generally, but I do it in a general way.

Mr. RAYNER. I want to state that the arrangement for a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] was made before this question came up, and I can not see how it could possibly apply to a question that came up to-day, unexpectedly.

Mr. KEAN. I am fully aware of that fact; and I do not know how my colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] would vote. I should be glad if the Senator from Maryland could arrange for a transfer of the pair so that he could vote.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. All this debate is out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. The Chair would ask if the Senator from Maryland withdrew his vote?

Mr. RAYNER. I will stand on my vote as cast. It can stand.

Mr. GAMBLE. I desire to announce that since my name was called my pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has been transferred to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ELKINS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY.] I see that he is not in the Chamber, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KEAN. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that he transfer his pair to my colleague.

Mr. ELKINS. Very well; I will transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], but I understand that my pair has been transferred to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. RAYNER. Is my vote recorded or withdrawn?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's vote is recorded.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I am informed by one of the men on the floor that there is some question raised as to the propriety of my voting. I do not know how the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] would vote, but if there is any question about the matter I will withdraw my vote and stand paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I was under the impression at the time I voted a few moments ago that a transfer of my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] had been arranged. I find that that has not been done, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 34, as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], that the credentials of the Senator-elect from Maryland be taken from the table and that the oath of office be now administered. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator-elect will present himself at the Vice-President's desk and take the oath prescribed by law. [Applause in the galleries.] The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that under the rules of the Senate applause is not permitted.

Mr. Smith, escorted by Mr. RAYNER, advanced to the Vice-President's desk, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

S. S. Wheeling, who is now pensioned at $24 per month, and who by reason of his present condition should be granted a pension of at least $50 per month, and for which the Commissioner of Pensions has not sufficient power or authority, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 26, 1908.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws be now laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. WARREN. I simply wish to inquire if any time has been granted for morning business to-day?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There has been no time granted for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. And is morning business now in order, with the consent of the Senator from Rhode Island, who has charge of the floor?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is in order by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Rhode Island is recognized, so long as he has the floor no morning business is in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I prefer that Senators will wait until to-morrow morning to present morning business.

Mr. WARREN. Very well; let it go over then.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not ask the Senator to yield, Mr. President. I thought the floor was not occupied.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not understand the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair asked the Senator from Rhode Island if he would yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. ALDRICH. I yield the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not desire to take the Senator from Rhode Island off the floor. I supposed the bill was before the Senate and that the floor was unoccupied by any Senator, and I addressed the Chair accordingly. If the Senator from Rhode Island has anything to say, I will wait until he concludes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have nothing to present. I merely called the bill up.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I then offer the amendment on the question of reserves, which I send to the desk, and invite the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the amendment now proposed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 3, after the words "Sec. 8," it is proposed to insert the following:

That from and after January 1, 1909, every national bank shall have and keep on hand in its vaults the reserve of lawful money provided for by law. All laws and parts of laws which authorize national banks to have and keep part of their reserve in other national banks are hereby repealed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state, Mr. President, that in some respects the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas as a substitute or an amendment to take the place of an amendment I offered yesterday I think is a better amendment than mine; and I am quite willing that it shall take the place of the amendment which I offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], which will be again stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the words "of the United States," in line 4, page 7, down to the word "every," in line 7, page 8, and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall pay a monthly tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent during the first three months after they shall be issued and of one-half of 1 per cent afterwards upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such bonds."

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. If it is, in my judgment, it will destroy the purpose of the bill. It was not the purpose of this measure to make the issue of notes by national banks profitable. It would be profitable if this amendment should be adopted, and I am quite sure that the result would be an immediate and large addition to the currency of the country, not to meet emergencies, but for ordinary business transactions. The amendment proposes to fix the rate for three months, but it would be extremely easy for any bank that desired to keep its circulation out on a 3 per cent basis to issue it for three months, and at the end of three months to issue it again; so that we would, in my judgment, have constantly in circulation an emergency currency taxed but 3 per cent. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on yesterday it adopted an amendment increasing the rate of interest after a certain number of months—I think four months—and this would be entirely at variance with that action on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on the amendment I desire to submit some remarks to the Senate expressing my reasons for desiring legislation of this character. I regret very much that the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. ALDRICH] is unable to accept the amendment which I have offered, because I am myself very much in earnest about it. I am very thoroughly convinced that it is a proper amendment. I believe that it would greatly strengthen this bill and that it would make it much more acceptable, not only to a large number of Senators upon this side of the Chamber, but to the people of the agricultural and manufacturing sections of this country. I want to say frankly——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply rise to a point of order, Mr. President. We adopted yesterday an amendment increasing the rate of interest for a certain proportionate time. Now, the question with me is whether the Senate as in Committee of the Whole can take up another amendment on the same line as the amendment adopted yesterday and make that a different amendment without amending the particular amendment that was adopted yesterday. If so, I have also an amendment on the same subject. I ask simply for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota rises to a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment now offered is in order, notwithstanding an amendment was formerly adopted upon a similar subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it is agreed to, will it take the place of the one adopted yesterday?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes; as the part to be struck out and inserted present substantially a different proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I regret very much that I do not recall at this time the amendment which was adopted on yesterday. The first reference that I have heard to it was the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and not knowing the exact terms of that amendment, I am not able to understand the reference that has been made. I therefore ask that that amendment be read, so that I can understand it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment referred to by the Senator from North Carolina.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, page 7, after the words "shall pay," insert:

For the first six months.

And in line 7, page 7, after the word "bonds," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the words:

And afterwards a monthly tax of three-quarters of 1 per cent upon the average amount of said notes.

So as to read:

National banking associations having on deposit bonds to secure their circulating notes other than bonds of the United States shall pay for the first six months a monthly tax of one-half of 1 per cent upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such bonds, and afterwards a monthly tax of three-quarters of 1 per cent upon the average amount of said notes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that amendment in no way conflicts with the amendment I have proposed. My amendment proposes to reduce the rate of tax as provided in the original bill during the first three months of the life of these notes from one-half of 1 per cent per month to one-fourth of 1 per cent per month. There is nothing in the amendment as adopted that conflicts with this proposition.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say frankly to Senators on the other side of the Chamber that I do not offer this amendment in any spirit of hostility to the pending bill, although in its present shape I can not vote for it. I sincerely wish that the bill might be put in a condition that I could vote for it. There is no Senator in this Chamber on this or on the other side——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator whether, if the amendment he has just proposed is adopted, he will vote for the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I will. I have so stated to the chairman of the committee. Senators will remember that in a speech I made upon this bill a few weeks ago I pointed out the main objections which I had to the bill. They were threefold. The first was the provision in regard to railroad bonds. That objection has been removed by striking these bonds from the bill. The second objection I then stated will be in part removed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], and which I am advised the Committee on Finance at its meeting this morning decided to accept. The third objection is covered by this amendment, and if it is adopted it will practically remove all of the objections to the bill which would make it impossible for me to give it my support. Even with these changes the bill would still be unsatisfactory to me, but, as I said, I think, with these amendments and changes, I can vote for it.

Mr. President, there is no Senator in this Chamber who recognizes more fully than I do the necessity for legislation providing an emergency currency, a currency which can be quickly brought into existence to meet abnormal conditions of panic or stringency, and which will just as quickly go out of existence when that emergency has passed away. I also recognize the fact that in the nature of things there must be, if the money is to meet an emergency caused by exceptional conditions, a sufficient tax to force it out of circulation when the emergency has passed.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, if I can have the attention for a moment of the Senator from Rhode Island, the original bill, if I understand correctly, provided that the tax shall be equal to 6 per cent per year; in other words, one-half of 1 per cent per month. I want to ask my friend from North Carolina this question: If we amend this bill and allow for the first three months the rate of taxation to be one-fourth of 1 per cent per month, could not the national banks take out this circulation for three months and pay the tax on it of one-fourth of 1 per cent, then retire it, and then take it out again for three months, and consequently the tax would be practically only 4 per cent per annum instead of 6 per cent per annum? Would not that enable the bankers to make more profit and would it not practically destroy the 6 per cent rate of interest, because they could simply retire the money, take it back, and reissue it at the end of three months?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that might be the case if it were not for the fact that the bill itself provides in specific terms that not one dollar of money can be issued under it until the Secretary of the Treasury has officially determined and decided that an emergency exists. If the Secretary of the Treasury decides that there is an emergency, under my amendment any bank can take this money out, and for three months it will be required to pay but one-fourth of 1 per cent per month. At the end of that three months it will have to pay one-half of 1 per cent. Suppose, as the Senator from Georgia suggests, the banker again desires to issue similar notes or notes for similar amounts in order to get the benefit of this reduced rate, he can not do it unless the Secretary of the Treasury determines that the emergency still exists; and so long as the emergency exists, I maintain there is no necessity for burdening this money with this heavy rate of taxation. If the Secretary determines the emergency is over he will have to pay the higher rate.

The bill as reported by the Finance Committee imposes a tax at 6 per cent upon every dollar of money issued under it from the hour that it is issued until the hour of its redemption and retirement. That tax, together with the expense incident to issue and redemption, will impose a fixed charge upon every dollar issued under this bill of about 6½ or 6⅝ per cent. In the great majority of States that is one-half of 1 per cent more than the legal rate of interest, and the great majority of the commercial banks—and national banks are commercial banks—do not, as a rule, charge over 6 per cent. So that we will have a money taxed one-half of 1 per cent in excess of the legal rate of interest and of the rate of interest that actually obtains in commercial and business transactions.

If a bank carries this class of bonds as a part of its permanent assets, if it keeps them, so to speak, in stock, as many of the great banks in the reserve cities do, or if, as is the case with many of these great financial institutions, it could, through its connection and affiliation with the great trust companies and insurance companies which carry these bonds as permanent investments, secure them without any cost to it, this money will only cost it about 6½ per cent, and such a bank can perhaps afford to use it and loan it without charging an exorbitant rate of interest; but that class of banks which are designated by the Treasury Department as country banks (and they include all the national banks of the country except those located in the reserve and central reserve cities) do not carry this class of securities and can not afford to carry them; they can not afford to invest money, for which they have a ready demand from their commercial customers at 6 per cent, in bonds drawing only 4 per cent interest. If they want these bonds as a basis of circulation, they must either borrow them and pay 2 per cent for their use—the owner of the bond getting the interest which they draw—or they must buy them with money taken from their vaults which could be loaned at 6 per cent, thereby losing 2 per cent interest in the transaction. To this class of banks the notes taken out under this bill would cost 8½ per cent and could not be loaned at a profit for less than 9 per cent.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who is chairman of the Committee on Finance, has said several times during the course of this debate that this bill was not intended for the benefit of the banks. He has charged that the bankers were against it. I agree with the Senator that we are not here to make a bill for the bankers; we are here to make a bill for the people; but I wish to remind the Senator that not one dollar of the money provided in his bill can get into the hands of the people except through the banks—they alone are authorized to issue money under its provisions. If they do not issue this emergency currency, the people will never get it. I believe the bankers of this country are as patriotic as any class of our fellow-citizens. Some of them may be grasping and greedy, but the great bulk of them are honest, patriotic, and fair-minded citizens. But they are business men, and they are in the banking business for the purpose of making money, and I am not so innocent as to suppose that they are going to issue this money for the benefit of the people at a loss to themselves, and I repeat if they do not issue it for any reason whatever, the people can never get it.

The position which I take is that the so-called "country banks" do not hold these bonds, and can only get them by borrowing them or by buying them; that to borrow them will cost 2 per cent interest; that to buy them there will be a loss of 2 per cent interest besides the loss on the difference between the cost of the bonds and the amount of money that may be issued against them, and a possible loss in the price paid in the purchase of the bonds at a time when they are high by reason of the demand for them created by this legislation and in the sale of them after that demand has passed.

I know the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has contended, and still contends, that it is not true that the so-called "country banks" do not invest in this class of securities. I know that he insists that as a matter of fact these banks carry a considerable amount of these bonds. It may be true that there are a good many of these bonds held by the banks in the country districts, but I am satisfied it will be found upon examination that but few of these bonds so held are really owned by the banks holding them; that the great bulk of them are bonds borrowed by them for deposit to secure Government deposits.

I shall, before I finish, present to the Senate evidence to show that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is wrong about this matter; to show that but few of these banks hold this kind of bonds, and that during the recent panic it was a common custom among them to borrow bonds for use as security for Government deposits.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in his very able argument on his substitute for this bill frankly admitted that the banks of the South and West did not as a rule carry this class of bonds. He said in the State of Texas very few of these bonds were held by national banks, or even by State banks, but he contended that good banking required that they should carry a reasonable amount of such securities, or securities of like character, and he declared if the proposed legislation made it necessary for them to carry more of this class of securities it would be a good thing.

Mr. President, I have the greatest respect for any opinion or judgment expressed by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], because I recognize his great powers; but in this contention he is, I think, in error. The obligations of a commercial bank are demand obligations. Nearly all the debts of a commercial bank are due to depositors and corresponding banks. Probably more than two-thirds of all the obligations of a commercial bank can be called at any hour of the day when the doors of the bank are open, and I maintain it is necessary in the interest of good and safe banking that the assets of such a bank shall be at all times as far as possible of a liquid character—that is, quickly convertible into cash.

We have to-day about 6,000 national banks. They have a capital of only about $1,000,000,000. They have on deposit about four and a half billion dollars, payable on the demand of their depositors. With demand obligations more than four times greater than their capital, I maintain it is not good banking for them to carry long-time paper. I maintain this condition calls for assets quickly convertible into money—in short, for short-time commercial paper.

In support of these propositions I desire to read a brief statement from a petition recently sent to Congress by the Board of Trade and Transportation of the city of New York. Here is one of the statements contained in that petition, signed by the president of that board and its finance committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator is aware, although he may not be, that the president of that association, the gentleman who signed this statement, is president of the New York Clearing House Association.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, he is. He is president of the Clearing House Association. I think the Senator ought to give him the credit that belongs to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not see how that affects the force of his statement. The petition is not signed by Mr. Gilbert alone. He signs it as the chairman of the board, but it is signed by the entire body of the committee on finance and taxation of the board. Mr. Gilbert may have some connection with the clearing house—I do not know how that is—and that fact may, in the opinion of the Senator from Rhode Island, discredit his statement, but I do not regard that as an impeaching fact. He is expressing an opinion about a banking system, and I do not think that the fact that he is a banker derogates from its weight as the questions and comments of the Senator seems to imply is his opinion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I mentioned that fact only for the purpose of showing that the Senator from North Carolina is cooperating with the leading banks and bankers of the United States in trying to secure the adoption of some other bill than the one now under consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. I admit the fact that many bankers are opposed to this bill. But they are not the only people who are opposed to it. Many leading business men engaged in transportation, in commerce, in manufacturing, and in agriculture believe it wrong in principle and vicious; believe that it discriminates in favor of one class of banks and against another and that if it is passed it will be largely inoperative because of the exorbitant and unnecessary tax it imposes on the money it authorizes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have called attention to this fact for the purpose further of stating that the president of the New York Clearing-House Association and all those who agree with him—and I am not now including in those the Senator from North Carolina, because I do not know what his views are—are opposed to this measure because they are in favor of asset currency. The president of the clearing-house association states that in the paper the Senator has in his hand, and he says he prefers to have this bill defeated, because then they will probably be able to get a chance to issue currency upon the assets of the banks without limit and without reserves.

And for that reason I am very glad the Senator from North Carolina is to put this article into the RECORD, with his apparent approval.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bankers of my State, as I know from actual correspondence and personal communication with them, are almost a unit against this bill. I have had letters from fifteen or twenty of them, and I say to the Senator they do not put their objection upon the ground that they want an asset currency, but upon the ground that on account of the high rate of tax prescribed it would be of but little, if any, benefit to them and the communities they represent.

It may be that the bankers of this country are in favor of an asset currency; it may be that Mr. Gilbert is in favor of an asset currency; but I submit that that is no reason why we should discredit and refuse to give due weight to any argument which they or he may present which addresses itself to our judgment against the system of the high-taxed bond-secured currency provided in this bill.

I do not believe the bankers of my State are opposed to this bill because they are in favor of an asset currency, if they are in favor of such a currency; but I believe they are opposed to it for the reasons I have given. Whatever may be their position upon the question of asset currency, it is sufficient for me that the reason they give for their opposition is one which addresses itself to my judgment.

I repudiate the suggestion of the Senator [Mr. ALDRICH] that I stand for the banks in this matter. I am not standing for the banks. I am standing for the people. But I recognize the fact that the people can not get the benefit of the emergency currency provided in this bill except through the banks, and I insist that the banks will not issue it if they must do so at a loss.

While I am not standing for the banks, I am not against the banks. I am not against any legitimate interest in this country. I want to see them all prosper and make money. I wish the people of this country could come to a full realization of the fact that the prosperity of every occupation is inseparably interwoven with the prosperity of every other occupation; that the interest of the banks, and the factories, and the railroads, and the mines, is closely allied with their interest, whatever may be their occupation. I wish we could realize more fully than we sometimes do this interdependence of interest. We can not strike down one interest, we can not abridge the prosperity of one interest, we can not deny it an opportunity to make a reasonable profit without affecting the prosperity of another interest, and in turn another interest, and so on, until the prosperity of the whole is affected. I want to see the banks make a fair profit; I want to see the manufacturers make a fair profit; and I want to see the railroads make a fair profit, because I am, among other things, a farmer, and I know if these great interests shall be denied reasonable profits from their investments, in the end my profits will be likewise affected.

I repeat I am not so much concerned about the profits of the banks as I am about their ability under this act to furnish the people the emergency currency which it purports to provide for them. You have so framed your bill that not a dollar of this money can be issued except by a national bank, and I charge that you have fixed the rate of interest so high that that class of banks which serve the country districts—the agricultural districts—can not afford to use it, will not issue it, and the people in those sections will derive no benefit from your act, except such as percolates to them through the great banks of the financial centers.

I will not stand for that. I may be for the banks and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] may be for the people, but it will be a surprise to the people of this country to learn that that Senator has lost his old-time interest in the financial classes and become the champion of the people against them.

Mr. President, I want a bill which will be operative, and I believe with this high tax this bill will be largely inoperative.

What reason I ask have we to suppose that banks will issue this money and pay a tax of 6 per cent per annum on it when in the late panic these same banks would not issue notes on Government bonds subject to a tax of only one-half of 1 per cent per annum? Did they not, despite the high price of interest and the pressing stringency, refuse to issue these notes? Did not the Secretary of the Treasury have to beg them and finally substantially lend them the money without interest to buy United States bonds for deposit to get them to issue them? Are they likely to come to the relief of the country by issuing notes taxed 6 per cent when they refused to do so by issuing notes taxed only one-half of 1 per cent? This bill in its present shape may increase the price of the bonds named in it, but as a currency measure I now predict it will prove of little, if any, value.

Mr. President, I will put these testimonials in the RECORD for the benefit of the Senator from Rhode Island, and he can have any consolation he can get out of them. They are not what Mr. Gilbert alone says, but what the committee on finance and taxation of the Board of Trade and Transportation of the city of New York says in reference to commercial banks carrying these bonds and in reference to the cost of this money.

Conservative bankers agree—

Says this petition—that investment in bonds by commercial banks is not in line of good banking. * * *

Everything a bank owes is payable on demand, and its assets at all times should be kept in the most liquid state possible.

Speaking about the cost of money issued under this bill, it uses this language:

Under the provisions of the bill—

That is, the Aldrich bill—

the cost of taking out currency and putting it in circulation would be so heavy that the bill would probably be inoperative.

* * * * * * *

The purchase of bonds with its attendant risk of loss, the tax of 6 per cent, the locking up of probably from 15 to 25 per cent of the cost of the bonds, would make the interest charge on the currency received so high that no banker could be induced to take it out. Even in the face of approaching panic bankers would hesitate to pay so high a rate for money.

In a speech delivered by Mr. Gilbert to this board he uses this language:

Considering the attendant risk and loss and the probability that the cost of currency would be at least 8 per cent and the amount of relief received one-third less than the amount required to purchase the bonds, I should hesitate before applying for any relief under the provisions of the Aldrich bill.

Continuing, he says:

If we are to have nothing more than provision for emergency currency at the present session of Congress, then let us have a measure that will not be hampered and made impracticable by provisions which require banks to buy bonds in an emergency and take the attendant risk of loss; or to borrow bonds, paying 2 per cent for the accommodation, which, added to the tax, will make the currency too expensive to take out.

I want to read further on the same line from certain resolutions recently adopted by the Trades League of Philadelphia. I will not read all of them, but such parts as are pertinent to the question I am discussing.

Resolved, That the Trades League of Philadelphia is unalterably opposed to the passage of the Aldrich currency bill—

I do not suppose the Senator from Rhode Island would contend that the members of the Trades League of the city of Philadelphia are moved in the passage of these resolutions by too great an interest in the banks—for the reason that it provides for additional bond-secured currency based on a deposit of State, municipal, and railroad bonds, which the country banks do not generally possess, and imposing a rate of interest which few commercial banks can afford to pay, thereby creating a fictitious value for certain bonds, favoring special financial interests, and ignoring the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial needs of the country.

Mr. President, there is one class of banks in this country that are probably in favor of this bill. It is the banks—like the Morgan and Rockefeller group—in the great reserve and the central reserve cities, who hold these bonds themselves, or control them through their connection and affiliation with the great trust and insurance companies, by whom they are held as permanent investment. They are in favor of it because it will give them 6 per cent money, while the country banks, who do not own these bonds and who will have to either borrow them or buy them at a loss of 2 per cent in interest, will have to pay 8 per cent for all the money they may issue under it, by reason of which disadvantage, if they use this money at all, they will find it to their advantage to obtain it from them instead of from the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. If there are any banks in existence in favor of the bill for these reasons, they would be much more in favor of it if they had to pay only 3 per cent taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That may be true. By the same process of reasoning I could add that banks make a greater profit on notes secured by Government bonds, because the tax is only one-half per cent per annum. But that is beside the question I am discussing. The point I am making—and I insist upon it—is that to relieve this money of this heavy tax, this tax of 6 per cent when it is in actual use, performing the function for which it was created, when it is at work relieving the stringency and distress of the country, is not a reduction of taxation in the interest of the banks, but it is a reduction of taxation in the interest of the people and the business of the country. I maintain that this tax is unnecessary, and that it is a tax upon the energy, the thrift, and industry of the people—and I am not going to be driven from my position by the suggestion that the banks would be benefited by this reduction.

I have here a statement, and a very strong statement, from a gentleman by the name of John L. Hamilton. I do not myself know the gentleman. I understand he is a prominent manufacturer in the city of New York. Perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island may enlighten me about him. I do not know him.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have heard of a man by the name of Hamilton who has been discussing the financial question. He lives in Illinois and not in New York. He is president of some kind of a banking institution in Illinois.

Mr. SIMMONS. He may be the same man or he may not. But the Senator says he is a banker, and that fact seems to disqualify him in his opinion as a witness.

Mr. President, it is a late day for the Senator from Rhode Island to stand up in the Senate and deride and repudiate the opinions of bankers. When did the Senator become the people's champion and the opponent of the wishes and interest of the financial classes? When we come to the consideration of the tariff, I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he will repel with the same aversion and distrust the suggestions of the manufacturers who are interested in fixing duties in the interest of their products?

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall expect that my friend the Senator from North Carolina will stand by these gentlemen then as he is doing now, and I think his advocacy and his championship will probably be very satisfactory to them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall stand by the manufacturers when the time comes so long as what they demand is in the interest of the people as well as of themselves. I want to say to the Senator that when a manufacturer comes here and asks something that may be in the interest of his business, if by granting it the general prosperity of the country will be promoted and the interest of the people will be advanced, I shall not oppose granting it. The question I ask the Senator is, When the tariff bill comes before us will he repudiate the testimony of the manufacturers as interested witnesses as he now does that of the bankers?

What I am insisting upon here is something that will benefit the people, and I say to take this 6 per cent tax off this money at the time it is performing its duty, at the time it is performing the functions for which it was created and put into circulation, is to relieve the business and the people of the country from an unnecessary burden and that they and not the bank are the chief beneficiaries. I ask that it be done in their interest and not in the interest of the bankers. When you want to drive it out of circulation put as much tax upon it as you please, but not when it is needed and is actually employed relieving the stringency and distress.

My proposition is to reduce the tax upon money issued under this bill to 3 per cent per annum during the first three months; after that time make it as high as you wish. I do not want this money burdened during the period of emergency when it is performing a great public function. When the emergency is over, to prevent inflation, I am willing for any reasonable tax to force it into retirement.

I fixed the term of three months in my amendment as the emergency period, because our experience shows that these periods of stringency generally lasts from two to three months. In the case of a great panic, like the one through which we have just passed, or through which we are now passing, the period of stringency is longer, but on an average I think it will be found to be about three months.

But, Mr. President, let me return to the testimony which I said I would offer to the Senate. I will now read what Mr. John L. Hamilton, banker, as the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] says, has to say upon the point of my contention that the country banks do not carry this class of bonds, and that this bill would therefore be of no practical benefit to them because of the cost of money issued under it. Mr. Hamilton says:

> The securities required are such as are not carried by scarcely a bank of the country class——

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps I do not do justice to Mr. Hamilton. I will say, in addition, that he is an ex-president of the American Banking Association. I ought to say that, perhaps, in justice to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Being a banker talking about finance, I assume he knows what he is saying. Mr. Hamilton says:

> The securities required are such as are not carried by scarcely a bank of the country class, or those required to carry a 15 per cent reserve, and if this bill should become a law, instead of being of any benefit to them—

That is the country banks—

> it would be a positive detriment, as compared with the present law.

Mr. President, I have another resolution that I want to read. The men who passed these resolutions are not bankers. These are resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Association of New York. They are men engaged in commerce. They are not men who loan money, but men who borrow money. Here is what they say:

> Resolved, That this committee on bankruptcy and commercial law disapproves Senate bill No. 3023, entitled "A bill to amend the national banking laws," introduced by Senator ALDRICH, for the following reasons: * * * Second. The high tax which this bill proposes to levy upon the issue of emergency currency, and which in the last analysis would be paid by the borrower to the banks, when increased as it would be in practice at least one-third by reserve requirements, is not only unnecessary, but oppressive, and in this and other States would provoke an immediate disregard of the statutes against usury. It is not—

Says this resolution of the Merchants' Association of New York, and they state a great truth when they say it—> becoming that a great nation should fill its coffers from the necessities of borrowers; and it is manifestly improper to pass one law which offers inducements to the violation of another.

But, Mr. President, if the Senator from Rhode Island will not accept any of the witnesses I have brought here, if he will not accept the evidence on these questions of fact of the Merchants' Association of New York, of the Trades League of Philadelphia, of the Board of Trade and Transportation of New York, and the bankers whose opinions I have read to show that on account of the high tax imposed by his bill on the money it authorizes, it will be largely inoperative and of but little if any benefit in relieving against panic and stringency, I am sure he will recognize the authority from whom I now propose to read. I am sure he is known to the Senator, for no man is better known or stands higher in the business world. It is James B. Forgan. Mr. Forgan is considered the greatest authority upon questions of banking and currency in this country, with the probable exception of Mr. Morgan. He is the president of the largest bank in the United States outside of the city of New York, the First National Bank of Chicago. The bank over which he presides has $14,000,000 in unimpaired capital and surplus, and carries deposits of about $100,000,000. Here is a part of what Mr. Forgan says upon this subject:

> Further, it is a fact that national banks do not invest except to a very small extent in such bonds. As a rule, they can not afford to and, being commercial banks, they naturally use their money for the direct benefit of their commercial customers. I have the honor to preside over the largest bank outside of New York City. We carry as an investment a very small amount of such bonds. When the recent currency stringency struck us we took out $3,000,000 of additional circulation and received on deposit some of the money distributed by the Government for the benefit of the general situation, but, as shown in our statement, we had to borrow nearly all the bonds used by us for that purpose.
> Other banks did likewise, as this was the only basis on which we could afford to use them. It cost us an average of 2 per cent to borrow them. This is what the national banks would invariably have to do before they could avail themselves of such a currency, and it would add to the expense of the circulation this additional 2 per cent, making its use cost 9 per cent.
> In a money stringency, with its shattering of public confidence and curtailment of credit, in what condition would the banks be to help their customers if they themselves are obliged to borrow currency at 9 per cent? They might do something to help speculation in Wall street, where alone money reaches such exorbitant rates. They could do nothing for the support of their commercial customers.
> The principle of the proposed legislation is directly the reverse of what it should be. Something should be done to avoid emergencies and to enable banks to tide their customers over periods of depression. This can not be done by issuing emergency currency, the very name of which is enough to breed a panic, nor by exorbitantly taxing the banks in the exercise of their legitimate functions.

Mr. President, there are three reasons why emergency money should be taxed. First, to prevent its issue when there is no emergency; second, to prevent more being issued at a given time than is needed to meet emergency conditions, and third, to force its retirement when the emergency is over.

If under the provisions of this bill a bank were permitted to take out money secured by State and municipal bonds at any time it pleased, in any amount it pleased, as national banks are now permitted to take out circulation based on Government bonds at their discretion both as to time and amount, there would be a necessity for a tax sufficiently high to prevent its issue when not needed for emergency purposes or in an amount not needed to supply the emergency. But that is not the case. Let me read the provisions of the bill upon this point.

It provides when an application is made to the Comptroller of the Currency for authority to issue additional circulating notes that—

> The Comptroller of the Currency shall transmit immediately the application, with his recommendation, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, if in his judgment business conditions in the locality demand additional circulation, approve the same and shall determine the time of issue and fix the amount, within limitations hereinafter imposed, of the additional circulating notes to be issued.

From this it will be seen that by the provisions of the bill not one dollar of this currency can be issued to any bank until the Secretary of the Treasury has officially determined that there is an emergency, and not one dollar more can be issued than the Secretary of the Treasury holds is needed to meet that emergency. The whole thing is placed by the terms of the bill in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. He settles the question when this money shall come forth and how much may be taken out at a given time, and there is no necessity of a tax to prevent too much being issued or to prevent an issue when business conditions do not require it.

The only reason for as high a tax as is here imposed is to force its retirement when the emergency is over. I concede that a tax sufficiently high for that purpose is necessary, and my amendment provides for a tax of 6 per cent for that purpose after the note has been out for three months, which is about the usual duration of these periods of stringency.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate much longer than I intended. I did not expect to speak five minutes, but I have, in my earnestness and in my zeal about this matter of an unnecessary tax on this money, spoken longer than I intended. The amendment which I offer proposes to reduce the tax during the first three months to one-fourth of 1 per cent per month. That is 3 per cent per annum. I would even be willing to compromise on 4 per cent per annum. The margin of 2 per cent represents the cost of the borrowing of bonds or of loss in buying bonds with 6 per cent money when they draw only 4 per cent. I would be satisfied with that. All I ask is a bill that will be workable, that will be usable, so to speak, by that great class of banks representing four-fifths of all the national banks of the country, known in the language of the Treasury Department as "country banks," and which serve the people of the agricultural district and the smaller cities and towns of the country.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] induce me to make an observation or two.

One of the general objections which I have always had to this bill is that it will create a demand for bonds in bond-holding centers of the country, which will be unjust to other sections.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state to the Senator from Rhode Island before he asks a question about it that my objection is not based upon the fact that I am in favor of an asset currency. I am in favor of a Government note, if we are to have any.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I dislike very much to interrupt the discourse of the Senator from Texas, but I wish he would let us take a vote on the pending amendment and address his remarks to some other feature of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is particularly pertinent at this point.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think we can get a vote on the pending amendment and perhaps two or three others without taking up the reserve amendment to-night. I am sure the Senator from Texas is desirous that we shall make some progress with the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am going to take only a moment.

I was saying that this objection of mine to the bill is emphasized by the fact of this high tax of 6 per cent a year, by reason of which, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], only a very few communities in the United States can take advantage of this emergency currency, and that in a sense it will be legislation along the lines of community favoritism.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me to state the case in a nutshell we can take the vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. That remark appeals to me.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am certain of that. We all, of course, appreciate the anxiety of the Senator with reference to this bill. That is known of all men, now, I believe.

In other words, there are only two communities in the United States, as I read the law, where the banks could take advantage of this law and reap any return upon their circulation. We might as well understand that the banks, as a rule, will not do this unless they can make money.

Now, let me illustrate that. The national banking law provides:

Any association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the State, Territory, or District where the bank is located, and no more, except that where by the laws of any State a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under State laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized or existing in any such State under this Title. When no rate is fixed by the laws of the State, Territory, or District, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding 7 per cent, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days from which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run.

Under the laws of the State of New York and, I believe, the State of Pennsylvania, the rate of interest is so regulated, taken in connection with the act of Congress from which I have read, that no national bank outside of New York and Pennsylvania can probably reap any benefit from the issuance of circulation under this bill.

I had copied the other day this law from section 13 of the revised statutes of New York, under the head of "Interest." It provides as follows:

In any case hereafter in which advances of money, repayable on demand, to an amount not less than $5,000, when made upon warehouse receipts, bills of lading, certificates of stock, certificates of deposit, bills of exchange, bonds, or other negotiable instruments pledged as collateral security for such repayment, it shall be lawful to receive or to contract to receive and collect as compensation for making such advances any sum to be agreed upon in writing by the parties to such transaction.

Mr. President, I understand that that law is applicable to the banks of the State of New York except in so far as it may possibly be modified by the section which I will now read, being section 56 of the banking law of the State of New York:

56. Upon advances of money, repayable on demand, to an amount not less than $5,000, made upon warehouse receipts, bills of lading, certificates of stock, certificates of deposit, bills of exchange, bonds, or other negotiable instruments, pledged as collateral security for such repayment, any bank or individual banker may receive or contract to receive and collect as compensation for making such advances any sum to be agreed upon—

"Any sum to be agreed upon"— in writing by the parties to such transaction.

Pennsylvania has a statute, enacted in 1903, identical with that of New York in regard to interest on demand loans.

No such law appears on the statute books of any other State, but in Arizona, California, Colorado, Massachusetts, Montana, Nevada, Rhode Island, and Utah there is no limit to the rate which may be charged under express contracts in writing.

In Alaska, Idaho, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming 12 per cent may be charged under contracts in writing.

In all the other States, with some minor exceptions as to small amounts, pawnbrokers, and the like, no greater rate than 10 per cent may be charged under any circumstances.

In Illinois the legal rate is 5 per cent and the highest conventional rate 7 per cent.

In Missouri the legal rate is 6 per cent and the highest conventional rate 8 per cent.

So that, endeavoring as I am to emphasize what was said by the Senator from North Carolina, it appears that in only two States in the Union are rates of interest on demand loans unlimited—the States of New York and Pennsylvania. It has been demonstrated in this debate that that perhaps accounts for the extraordinary scenes on the Stock Exchange of New York in the recent panic, when the national banks there were loaning money, according to the Comptroller of the Currency, at from 2½ to 125 per cent on call and on demand.

I want to impress upon the Senate and upon the country that this bill in its present form, as I undertook to show on another occasion, will operate in the interest of a few sections of the country where the bonds provided for have accumulated, and it is in the interest especially of the national banks of the city of New York, which, under the authority of the act of the legislature of that State, in connection with the national banking laws, may loan money at any rate of interest on demand or on call loans.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, as pertinent to the very able speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], which I listened to with much interest, and to the remarks which have just been made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] in regard to the benefits which will accrue to the national banks of New York City and New York State from this legislation, and to the suggestion that they are in favor of it and doing what they can to pass it, I will state that I am in receipt of a letter from the New York State Bankers' Association, and I will read it. This association includes, I think, every national bank in the State of New York, both in the city of New York and in the country. The writer says:

NEW YORK STATE BANKERS' ASSOCIATION,
BROADWAY AND THIRTY-NINTH STREET,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
New York City, February 27, 1908.

Hon. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The New York State Bankers' Association has, through its council of administration, a body which represents the important banking interests of the whole State as well as the city of New York, taken an active interest in the prospective currency legislation which is now under consideration by both Houses of Congress.

Our association distinctly disapproves of the Aldrich bill as a whole, believing that if this bill becomes a law the best interests of the cititens of the country will not be subserved; that its ultimate results would be disastrous to our commercial interests, and, notwithstanding the manifest necessity for relief from the present situation, it would be preferable to have no legislation at all rather than that this unwise measure become a law.

At a recent meeting of the council of administration the following resolution was unanimously adopted, namely:

"Resolved, That the bankers of the State of New York unqualifiedly disapprove of the provisions of the Aldrich bill; that they do not approve of a bond-emergency currency; that they demand an elastic currency based on bank assets, as provided in the measure of the currency commission of the American Bankers' Association."

May I ask you to give me your views, saying whether you agree or disagree with the ideas above expressed. I inclose stamped envelope, and awaiting your response, am,

Very truly, yours, E. O. ELDREDGE, Secretary.

Mr. President, that is an authoritative declaration on the part of the bankers of the State of New York, which is directly the reverse of the position which has been assigned to them upon this floor. They are unanimously opposed to the Aldrich bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the place of the amendment that I offered yesterday relative to the interest on Government deposits.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill, as a new section, the following:

SEC. —. That all national banking associations designated as regular depositaries of public money shall pay upon all special and additional deposits made by the Secretary of the Treasury in such depositaries, and all such associations designated as temporary depositaries of public money shall pay upon all sums of public money deposited in such associations interest at such a rate as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; not less, however, than 1 per cent per annum upon the average monthly amount of such deposits: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to change or modify the obligation of any association or any of its officers for the safe keeping of public money.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been stated.

Mr. CLAY. I move where the words "1 per cent" occur in the amendment, to strike out "one" and insert "two," so as to read "not less, however, than 2 per cent," and so forth.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the words "per cent" it is proposed to strike out "one," and insert "two," so as to read:

Not less, however, than 2 per cent per annum, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" have it.

Mr. CLAY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am quite sure if this amendment were adopted it would prevent any country banks at least from accepting any money from the Government, especially in ordinary times. It would certainly have that effect, because no bank in the country, in my judgment, could afford to pay 2 per cent upon deposits.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator that in my State we have a statute providing that surplus money in the State treasury can be deposited with certain banks to be named by the treasurer of the State. The treasurer of the State is authorized to receive bids for this money and, after carefully examining them, to accept such bids as he may deem to the best interests of the State. My observation teaches me that in many instances the banks have paid as high as 2½ and in some instances 3 per cent interest. One per cent is quite a small interest. I do not believe it is worth while to amend this proposed law in the matter of charging any interest at all if we fix it at simply 1 per cent. Two per cent is a very small minimum.

I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate, and I am willing to take a vote on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia, I suppose, is aware that, in addition to that, the amendment fixes 1 per cent as the minimum rate.

Mr. CLAY. I know that.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, if adopted, will also fix the minimum rate.

Mr. CLAY. At 2 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know under what conditions, of course, loans are made in the State of Georgia, or whether or not security is required.

Mr. CLAY. Security is required on all of these deposits.

Mr. ALDRICH. What kind of security?

Mr. CLAY. Personal security, but not bonds—personal security to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. Personal security by the bank?

Mr. CLAY. Security is required by the treasurer of the State of Georgia.

Mr. ALDRICH. I know we have had all over the country in recent years great losses to States and to communities because of the failure of banks that had State deposits or municipal deposits, and usually they are made without security. I do not know, of course, what the law is in Georgia, but I am inclined to think—in fact, I feel certain—that if this provision is put in the bill in the form of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia, it will prevent a distribution of public moneys throughout the United States, because the banks will not take them.

Mr. CLAY. I do not think it would have that effect; but I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I hope we shall reach a point after a while where we shall not have a large amount of surplus in the Treasury to deposit in banks. Of course, we are bound to keep on hand a certain amount of surplus. We can not do the business of the Government without it—not two or three hundred million dollars, however. Two per cent is a very small interest. The Senator from Rhode Island called my attention to the fact the other day that there is only one State in the Union whose State bonds are drawing a rate of interest less than, I believe, 3 per cent, and that is Massachusetts. I understand Massachusetts bonds—I do not know that I am correct in that—draw a rate of interest equal to 3 per cent; some of them draw 4 per cent, and a very few of them above 4 per cent.

When you fix this rate of interest at the minimum rate of 1 per cent, and leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to say what rate shall be fixed, in my judgment you will always find the rate fixed at 1 per cent. The Secretary of the Treasury will construe the law to direct him to fix the rate of interest at 1 per cent. I do not believe that 2 per cent is too much, and for that reason I have offered the amendment.

I know the Senator from Rhode Island is exceedingly anxious to reach a vote, and he is not alone in that desire. The remainder of the Senate is exceedingly anxious to get through with this bill, and I am ready to vote on the amendment without any further remarks.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I believe this proposition has the approval of a part of the Committee on Finance. As a member of that committee I want to say that I do not approve of it. I do not myself approve of requring a bank which takes money from the United States to pay interest on it. Heretofore when we have put money into a bank we have put it in as a Government depositary to receive and take care of Government money. Mr. President, when you require a bank to pay interest on it you make it a loan to the bank. I am opposed to the lending of money to the banks or to individuals by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator is correct in his view that the Government ought not to require any interest on a deposit, and that it becomes a loan instead of a special deposit, does not the Senator think, if we require interest at all, that 2 per cent would be too high?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, my objection is not to the 1 per cent nor to the 2 per cent. I think with the Senator from Georgia that if the banks are going to pay interest on deposits at all they may pay 2 per cent very properly and profitably, too.

Mr. President, when you put money in a bank and the bank has become the owner of the money and pays interest on it, there is a moral obligation on the part of the Government to let the money stay there a little while; and whenever you have got a disturbed condition and the bank has paid interest on the money for a year or two, which it may, when the disturbance commences the bank will claim—and probably with some reason—that it has held the money when there was plenty of money and the Government has been deriving the benefit, and when trouble comes the bank ought to be allowed to keep it.

I have on several occasions here declared that I would not vote to compel the banks to pay interest on money deposited. I am not in favor of depositing money in banks, except upon the theory that it is beneficial to the Government so to do, or when an emergency comes, such as we have had heretofore, and it probably becomes the duty of the Government to help the country to currency—not particularly to help the banks, but to help everybody, to help the whole country, the commerce of the country, and the business of the country.

I do not find any fault with the fact that the Government has put two or three hundred million dollars or $250,000,000, or whatever it may have been, in the banks. I approve of that, because I think it ought to have been done; but I do not believe in the Government lending money to banks or to individuals. It seems to me this is the beginning of a system which may bring us into trouble.

I do not wish to interfere with the action of the committee. I did not agree to it, and I wanted to put on record my reasons why I did not agree to it.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado if he desires to have the deposits of the Government the same as those of individuals with respect to checking against them from day to day, and that the Government may check its money any day? The Government is well secured; it can get its money out any day, and consequently the banks should not pay interest upon it. If so, I agree with him.

Mr. TELLER. I intended to say the Government has always had the right on a minute's notice to take its money out of the banks, and until the banks begin to pay interest on it the Government will maintain that right.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. After that the Government will hardly have that right.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Wyoming allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator from Wyoming think that the fact that we have adopted an amendment to this bill, providing that national banks designated as depositaries shall pay interest at a certain rate, would deprive the Government from checking on its money when the Government needed it? I can not think the Senator intends to take that position.

Mr. WARREN. I take the position that the money the Government deposits in the banks without interest is on call or check at a moment's notice. The bank is compelled, in the first place, to amply secure the Government, and the money is the same as if it were in the Government's own vaults. I agree with the Senator from Colorado perfectly, that the moment you take interest for that money there is an obligation, moral, if not legal, that you shall give due notice; that you shall not distress the party who borrows your money—in other words, the banks become borrowers. There is a very great difference between a place to deposit and a place of investment or loan.

Mr. LODGE. Let me ask the Senator, before he takes his seat, whether, as a matter of fact, it is not true that the Secretary of the Treasury invariably gives notice when he is going to call for any of this money.

Mr. WARREN. He does, as a matter of courtesy, but not as a matter of obligation.

Mr. LODGE. As a matter of courtesy.

Mr. WARREN. He does it as a matter of courtesy; but I claim that there is no obligation whatever to give notice in the case of money deposited without interest.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator that there is no obligation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to contribute a little testimony within my own experience which I think has a bearing upon the proposition under discussion. It is urged in opposition to the amendment which proposes a 2 per cent interest rate upon Government deposits that such a rate is so high that it will prevent the placing of this money with the banks. The law of Wisconsin permits the deposit of State funds with State and national banks. This law has been in force for some fifteen years. The State charges the banks from 2 to 2½ per cent interest for the use of such money. During the five years that I was governor I was under the law a member of the board of deposits, charged with the duty of passing upon the applications of banks to be designated as depositaries. I know personally that all the money the State had that was not required to meet its current expenses from month to month was constantly in demand by the banks of the State, and during that time the rate of interest was raised from 2 per cent to 2½ per cent.

There was always, Mr. President, a long list of applications from banks waiting to be named as depositaries. They were eager to take the State's money at that rate, taking it always, sir, with the understanding that it was subject to call at any time and glad to have it upon those conditions. I undertake to say that if this amendment fixing the rate at 2 per cent is adopted, it will be no hindrance to the placing of this money widely over the country. This money is sought for and will be sought for at that rate of interest and would be sought for at even a higher rate of interest.

But, sir, another thought. Suppose that the Government did not keep this money constantly in the depositaries; suppose that the current business demand for money fell off somewhat and the banks returned the money to the Treasury rather than pay that rate of interest; I want to suggest that that very thing would invest the $222,000,000 now in the banks of the country with an element of elasticity that would go far to meet the demand that is felt in this country for that quality in our currency circulation, and would operate to return the money, when business did not demand it, into the Treasury as a great reservoir, from which it could be again drawn in the crop-moving period.

Mr. WARREN. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. What security does the State require of the banks which receive these deposits?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The State requires the giving of a bond, upon which the board of deposits passes as to its sufficiency.

Mr. WARREN. But the bank does not have to put up property or deposit Government bonds?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. HOPKINS. The bond of a surety company.

Mr. WARREN. It is a matter of a surety bond.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A surety bond may be accepted; in fact, any bond which meets the approval of the board of deposits is accepted.

Mr. WARREN. In other words, it is an I. O. U., plus the I. O. U. of several people or firms that may be guarantors.

Now, another question, please. Is there not some difference in a State where the legislature appropriates the money, usually for two years at a time and decides how it shall be expended, ordinarily providing that a certain proportion only shall be expended in any one month or any two months, does not that make the condition different, because the bank itself from the appropriation bill of the State can provide itself with knowledge as to just how that money will be drawn out, and is it not a time loan in its practical effect?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not in any sense, Mr. President; the money is from time to time withdrawn from the banks by the State, and the banks are ready to receive deposits whenever the funds can be redeposited by the State. Every State in the Union is adopting similar legislation, and since the famous treasury case of Wisconsin, which I believe was the first State to decide that it was wrongful for any treasurer or any custodian of public funds to permit those funds to be placed in the banks and to take interest thereon—I say since the decision in that case and the adoption of a State law regulating the depositing of the money in banks and imposing an interest charge on such deposits, other States have followed, and this legislation has been and is being very generally adopted throughout the country.

Mr. WARREN. Does not the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Does not the Senator see a great difference between the outflow and inflow of a State, where every dollar of outgo is provided for specifically by biennial appropriation bills, and the wants of a government that has money on conditional appropriations under many heads? The State, on the one hand, derives its money by taxation direct, providing exactly what it needs. The United States receives its money from customs that may vary many million dollars, in fact, hundreds of millions of dollars in a given time. Is there not a difference between the deposits of the Government in a national bank and the deposits of a State, considering the conditions which I have just mentioned?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Considering, Mr. President, the difference in the magnitude of the business of the National Government and that of the States, there is no substantial difference. We know practically what the customs receipts are to be from year to year. We know substantially what the expenditures are to be. The appropriation bills make provision for them. It is true that there are conditional expenditures of the National Government. It is equally true that there are conditional expenditures of the State governments. There is no substantial difference when you get down to the principle, and there is no good reason why these banks should not pay interest on Government deposits.

Anybody who attempts to distinguish between making it a loan and making it a deposit will, I think, run into a bog of difficulties. The moment the banks take Government money, mix it with their funds, and loan it out it amounts to a loan on the part of the Government to the banks. The banks are not obliged under any circumstances to take this money.

Just as the chairman of the Finance Committee said in his address to the Senate with respect to the bonds designated in this bill as security for currency issue, if any bank does not wish to invest in the municipal and other bonds provided for in this bill, it does not have to do so. The banks do not need to take the benefit of this bill if they do not want to. If any national bank in this country does not want these deposits at 2 per cent, there is no kind of compulsion in the proposition. They need not take them. But they will take them; and, Mr. President, if this rate should be found so high as to interfere with the returning of this money into circulation when it ought to go there, another session of Congress can take care of that matter, I think, without any difficulty. From experience, I undertake to say that if any of the Senators on this floor from the States where interest is charged upon State funds will rise here and state the facts as to conditions in those States, there will be a concurrence of testimony that a 2 and a 2½ per cent interest rate does not interfere with the placing of State money in the banks for use.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am not quarreling with the 2 per cent interest rate. I think that can be secured very readily, and I do not thing it is too high. Heretofore no Government money has been deposited except in Government depositaries. Every bank is made a Government depositary before money is put there. That money is not a loan; it is a deposit, and no matter what the bank does with it, provided it returns it when the Government calls for it, its obligation is kept. What I object to is to change from a system of deposits to an actual loan by the Government of the United States.

It may be that the State of Wisconsin and other States loan money. I think a State may do that, unless its constitution prevents, but I do not know of any authority the United States has to loan money to anybody. I know it does not exist; it can not be shown. We could not give them such authority if we should try.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to say with regard to this matter that the amendment as it came from the committee met my approval, and the proviso of that amendment means the contention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. That proviso leaves the funds deposited in trust, as they are now under the present law, and undoubtedly, whatever the law is, it has been interpreted in this country to mean that this $220,000,000 should be utilized by the bankers of this country as a means of enlarging the currency, and that has been done.

I think the most important reason in behalf of this amendment has not been stated, and that is, that the banks ought not to be allowed to profit out of the Government funds, because that gives to the banks a special reason to keep this fund not only as large as it is, but to enlarge it still more by withdrawing from the people of the United States money which ought to be left in the hands of the people of the United States. This provision will go to check that tendency on the part of the banks to favor the enlargement of this fund, and I think it is a wise amendment to the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but for a moment. This question of the interest rate is purely a practical question. Of course, the deposit of this money is not analogous, it seems to me, to State and municipal deposits. I know in my own city the municipal funds are deposited in the banks and trust companies at certain rates, but the banks and trust companies which accept such deposits know within a reasonable length of time exactly when the money will have to be paid. They are practically loans for a specified time.

Mr. HOPKINS. Time loans.

Mr. ALDRICH. Substantially time loans. The Government deposits are not of that character, and none of us, I suppose, intend to make them so. The provision of this amendment—whether the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment is adopted or not—leaves the matter entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. I think we are bound to suppose that that officer, if there is a rate for money throughout the country which would warrant him in charging a higher rate, would do it. I think we are bound to assume that the officer will do the right thing.

I am myself confident that if this amendment is adopted the result will be just what the Senators upon the other side are all the time saying ought not to be done—to concentrate these loans at all times practically in the great money centers.

Mr. McLAURIN. I wish to ask the Senator from Rhode Island if there is any provision in this amendment which will require the interest paid by the depositaries to be uniform and equal throughout the entire country, or could the Secretary provide that one rate should be charged in one locality and another rate in another locality?

Mr. ALDRICH. He could do it, but it is impossible to suppose that any Secretary of the Treasury would do that.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think that such power ought to be left to the discretion of any officer. The amendment ought to be so worded——

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Minnesota would not object to an amendment making it uniform?

Mr. NELSON. I would not object. I thought of that question, but I do not think any Secretary of the Treasury would exact one rate from banks in one end of the country and a different rate from those at another end of the country.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think so——

Mr. NELSON. We must assume, I will say in all candor to the Senator from Mississippi, that our public officials, like the Secretary of the Treasury, are honest and well-meaning and fair-minded people, like we suppose ourselves to be, and I have no idea that any Secretary of the Treasury, be he Republican or Democrat or Populist, or even Socialist, would undertake anything like that. I thought it was better to leave it in the form in which it is.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not assume that the Secretary of the Treasury would make any such discrimination. I assume that the Secretary of the Treasury is an honest man and a patriotic man, who desires to do his duty, but we make laws for everybody, and I think we ought to make laws for officers just as we do for everybody else. I think we ought to make laws for ourselves, and we do make laws to govern ourselves. We do not assume that Senators or Representatives are going to take bribes, but we have a law that would punish one if he did take a bribe. I do not think it is a reflection upon any Secretary of the Treasury to put a provision in the law requiring the same rate of interest to be paid in every section of the country. I think it would be a very sensitive Secretary of the Treasury or a sensitive friend of the Secretary who would so understand it. I think something of this kind ought to be in the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask a question of the Senator introducing the amendment. Is it contemplated that the Government may collect interest on the daily balance of accounts or deposits made for the convenience of the Government?

Mr. NELSON. No; not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are, I think, about $60,000,000——

Mr. NELSON. I want to explain to the Senator my point. My original amendment offered yesterday was open to that objection. The amendment now has been carefully framed so as not to cover deposits of that kind made by revenue collectors, customs collectors, postmasters, land officers, or officials of that kind. All these deposits are free, and do not come under the amendment at all. It is only such general deposits as were made, for instance, in the recent panic.

Mr. HEYBURN. Loans?

Mr. NELSON. Loans.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is contemplated that the Government shall collect interest on monthly balances except where the Government makes a direct loan to the bank under the contract which this law authorizes. Is that it?

Mr. NELSON. It is limited to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then this recognizes the principle of the Government loaning money to national banks whether they are designated as depositaries or not?

Mr. NELSON. No; they must be designated as depositaries.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then what provision is there for discriminating? Now, the Government will not designate a depositary unless it considers it will be for the convenience of the Government. Would these loans be confined to those banks?

Mr. NELSON. It would be confined to deposits of that kind.

Mr. HEYBURN. In that class of banks, or does it establish a new class of banks?

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. It recognizes——

Mr. NELSON. The Government designates a bank as a depositary. For instance, a country bank in Minnesota applies to the Treasury Department for a deposit of fifty or a hundred thousand dollars. The Treasury Department accedes to that request and makes the deposit there. It is just a naked deposit of money. The Government does not have any business there. There is no deposit made by a postmaster or other Government official. There is no money drawn by any Government official or any checks drawn against the deposit. It is simply a naked deposit by the Government; and on that kind of a deposit the bank is to pay interest.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the substance of the amendment is that the Government may, under the provisions of the amendment, select banks in addition to the class now constituted as Government depositaries, to whom it will loan money.

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the banks to whom it will loan money must be selected upon application?

Mr. NELSON. No; not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems to me that would be the effect of it.

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. Because a Government depositary is never created except for the convenience of the Government. The wants of the bank are not taken into consideration. So you would either have two classes of deposits with the Government depositaries created under existing conditions or else you would create a new class of Government depositaries, purely banks designated for the purpose of obtaining loans from the United States. Is that the effect of the amendment?

Mr. NELSON. No; it is not the effect of the amendment. The Senator misapprehends it. The Government to-day has depositaries all over the country. I know in my own State there are a number of country banks which have these naked, as I call them, Government deposits. Then we have another class of banks in the large cities which receive two kinds of deposits. In the recent panic they got a deposit direct from the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. Which was a loan?

Mr. NELSON. But they also receive deposits from day to day and from time to time from the revenue collectors and the collectors of customs and postmasters within the territory.

Mr. HEYBURN. For the convenience of the Government?

Mr. NELSON. For the convenience of the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not for the convenience of the bank.

Mr. NELSON. Those deposits which they receive from public officials will not draw interest under the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it is proposed to loan the money of the Government, upon the application of approved banks, under a contract for the payment of interest by the banks upon the monthly balances. That, as I understand, is the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. NELSON. It makes no change in the law. It leaves the Government to make deposits just as it did in the recent panic. The only difference is that we require the banks to pay interest on their monthly balances.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that. The loans that were made during the recent panic were not made pursuant to any law at all.

They were made by the grace of the Government. There is no law authorizing the Government to loan money to a national bank or to any other person. The Government is required under existing law to keep the money in its own Treasury, except as it may deposit in selected depositaries money that it will need for its own purposes. It is merely a matter of the convenience of the Government.

I only rose to say, in order that my vote may not be misunderstood, that I shall vote against any proposition that recognizes the right of the Government to loan money to anybody, and I care not whether it is 1 per cent or 2 per cent or 10 per cent; that makes no difference. I am opposed to the Government entering into that class of business, and I shall vote against any proposition that recognizes such a business transaction as the Government loaning money at any time, under any conditions, subject to a contract between the borrower and the lender, and my vote will be cast against both the amendment and the substitute or any other amendment or any other provision of the bill which creates that new function in the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] has a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. If my colleague were here he has authorized me to say he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). By arrangement with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] my regular pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has been transferred, so that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] will stand paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and I may vote. I vote "nay." I wish to announce that I will permit that arrangement of pairs to stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. NELSON (after having voted in the negative). I desire to announce that if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] were present he would vote the same as I have voted on this amendment. I desire to state what I failed to do yesterday, that on the vote taken on the amendments yesterday the Senator from South Dakota would have voted the same as I did. I wish that to be noted in the RECORD.

Mr. GAMBLE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. Arrangements have been made whereby the pair is transferred to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I desire to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (after having voted in the negative). I am informed that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has left the Chamber without voting. So I withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is without a pair, and I suggest that the Senator transfer his pair to him.

Mr. WARREN. Very well; I transfer the pair in that way.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and when I undertook to vote a while ago, when we were disposing of the Senatorial election case, some question was raised as to whether I had a right to transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. I therefore withdraw my vote. I did not desire that any question should be made as to whether I had a right to vote. Now I propose, if it is agreeable to the Senate, to transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. If no question is raised about it, I will let it stand in that way, and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice that the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] is not in his seat, and has not voted. Therefore I withdraw my vote, having a general pair with the senior Senator from California.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bankhead	Clay	Gore	McLaurin
Borah	Culberson	Johnston	Owen

So Mr. CLAY's amendment to Mr. NELSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAURIN. On the line I suggested a while ago, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment the following:

The rate of interest charged shall be equal and uniform throughout the country.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that it would be better to say "United States." It is more usual.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated, at the request of the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment the following words:

The rate of interest charged shall be equal and uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. My request was that the amendment itself be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the entire amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. —. That all national banking associations designated as regular depositaries of public money shall pay upon all special and additional deposits made by the Secretary of the Treasury in such depositaries and all such associations designated as temporary depositaries of public money shall pay upon all sums of public money deposited in such associations interest at such a rate as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, not less, however, than 1 per cent per annum upon the average monthly amount of such deposits: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to change or modify the obligation of any association or any of its officers for the safe-keeping of public money: Provided further, That the rate of interest charged shall be equal and uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have the first part of the amendment which refers to the class of depositaries again read. I think there is some question about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. —. That all national banking associations designated as regular depositaries of public money shall pay upon all special and additional deposits——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is enough. I inquired of the Senator from Minnesota whether that class of depositaries was included in this amendment providing for the payment of interest on monthly balances, and I understood the Senator to say the amendment did not include regular depositaries.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will allow the amendment to be read a little further, he will see that the regular deposits are not covered by this amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment had better be reported again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the proposed amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the amendment which is pending is typewritten, not printed and distributed, and it is impossible for me to propose the amendment I wish in exact and proper terms. I want to amend so that instead of the rate of interest being left to the Secretary of the Treasury it will read that "the interest shall be paid for the months of August, September, October, and November of each year at the rate of 1½ per cent per annum; for the months of December, January, February, and March of each year at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and for the months of April, May, June, and July of each year at the rate of 5 per cent per annum."

I will state——

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. Before the Senator commences his remarks I ask him how this would affect the movement of the cotton crop in the South, if the rate should be so arranged simply to have a low rate of interest during the period of moving the crops in the South, and the crops of the North would have to pay a higher rate of interest.

Mr. CULBERSON. The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, I will say, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from California, stated during the panic that there had been deposited in the national banks something like $250,000,000, I believe, to assist in moving crops, especially the cotton crop of the South. The object of this amendment is to make this certain, to fix the rate of interest by law and not leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to fix it, and in order to accomplish the purpose of aiding in moving the crops, to have a low rate of interest on the money during the crop-moving season—August, September, October, and November—and to graduate it after that so that the money can be driven out of the banks and back into the Treasury of the United States.

We have heard a good deal about an elastic currency. We have heard a good deal about an emergency currency. The substance of this amendment, and it has been on file since the 13th of February, 1908, and its purpose is to create that character of funds which will flow into the banks when it is needed to move the crops and flow back into the Treasury after that season is over and the emergency for its use no longer exists.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and other Senators have declared that they are opposed to charging the national banks of the country interest on public deposits. I voted against the law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit this money in the banks. I did so because the Government of the United States ought not to go into the money-lending business—for that is what it is—in the first place; and, in the second place, because if we encourage this we encourage the system of high taxes which piles up a surplus in the Treasury.

But as long as the law is on the statute book authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit this money in national banks, and he deposits it there, I am in favor of charging them a reasonable rate of interest. It is money drawn from all the people of the United States by taxation. It does not belong to any class of our citizenship, but to all classes. Why should we loan it to the national banks of the country, without interest, to be loaned out by them at a rate of interest which will make them money over and above what they may have to pay for the bonds that secure it?

It has been said here that the act of the Secretary of the Treasury is approved in depositing this money in the national banks and principally the banks of New York City. Why should they not pay interest if it is done? They took money belonging to the people of the United States and loaned it during the recent stringency at 50 per cent on Wall street. I am taking the admitted interest figures during the panic. I am taking the rate charged by the sponsor, so it is said, of this bill, the head of the Morgan interests. The deposits of public money in New York City during the financial disturbance there were increased $47,000,000, reaching a total of $75,000,000, and much of it was loaned at rates, it is believed, as high as 125.

Why should they not pay interest, sir? It is loaned to them for their benefit. They reap the benefit, and they ought to pay something to the people of the United States if this money is to be deposited with them.

It is said, it has been said here to-day, that the Government ought to have deposited this vast amount of public funds in the national banks of New York on account of the crisis. Why, sir, on the 14th day of February last, long after the acute stage of the crisis had passed, the Standard Oil bank of New York, the National City Bank, had on deposit more than $13,000,000 of the public money without interest. Why is that kept there? And why, if it is still kept there, should they not pay the public interest on it? I submit, Mr. President, that the amendment which I have proposed, although I do not expect it to be adopted, ought to be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to renew the amendment which I offered yesterday in regard to the Philippine bonds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Porto Rico," page 4, insert:

Bonds of the government of the Philippine Islands and bonds of the city of Manila.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. CLAY. May I ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question? It was stated on the floor of the Senate yesterday during the morning session that this amendment would be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was.

Mr. CLAY. And the committee has reported on it?

Mr. ALDRICH. A majority of the committee, in any event, approve the amendment in its present form, not including railroad bonds. I should like to dispose of the amendment, if we can do so, because I would like then to have the bill as amended printed for the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. I think it ought to go over until to-morrow at least. It will lead to discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope it will not lead to any discussion.

Mr. CLAY. It is now 6 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. I would just as lief discuss it now as at any time.

Mr. CLAY. That may be true. We have been discussing amendments during the day, and this amendment has just come from the committee.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment has been pending here for six weeks. It was discussed fully yesterday. It is a very simple amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I do not think it was discussed very fully, because my recollection is that the Senator from Massachusetts, after a few minutes' discussion, agreed to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE. It was discussed fully, and then at the request of the chairman I let it go over. I said all that was important in regard to the bonds, except that they are exempt from taxation throughout the United States and that they sell higher—I have here a list of State and municipal bonds—they sell higher than bonds of almost any State; and yet people are talking about their being worthless!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas demands the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Porto Rico," in the amendment already agreed to in the bill, adding "the bonds of the insular government of Porto Rico," insert:

Bonds of the government of the Philippine Islands and bonds of the city of Manila.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I have transferred that pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and I vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I again announce a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. By an arrangement I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I again announce that I have a general pair with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

So Mr. LODGE's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment in regard to the reserves. On the 12th of February I offered an amendment requiring the banks to keep 10 per cent of their reserves in their vaults, of which 5 per cent might be in bonds. I thought then that that was as large an amount as we could probably carry through the Senate, but having changed my opinion about that, I have changed the amendment so that it requires 12 per cent of the reserves to be kept in the vaults of the banks, of which 4 per cent may be in bonds, increasing the amount required to be held in the reserve from 6 per cent to 12 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 4, insert:

That after January 1, 1909, national banking associations located outside of reserve or central-reserve cities, which are now required by law to keep a reserve equal to 15 per cent of their deposit liabilities, shall hereafter hold in their own vaults four-fifths of such reserves, either in lawful money as now required by law or in the securities enumerated in section 2 of this act, which shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That not more than one-third of the reserves required to be kept in the vaults of such associations shall be held in such securities.

Mr. NELSON. That is a very important amendment. I will suggest to the chairman that it be printed, and let the matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. That was my purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask also that there may be a reprint of the bill as it has been amended by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the bill be reprinted in the form in which it has been amended. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 27, 1908, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 26, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 16882) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 49.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be instructed to investigate and report a plan for the preservation and commemoration of old Fort Kearney, in the State of Nebraska.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill. Pending that motion, I wish to ask unanimous consent that the time for closing general debate on this bill be extended for one hour, that hour to be occupied by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chairs hears none.

Mr. SULZER. I understand the gentleman yields that hour to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas; with that understanding I have no objection.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a long time ago in one of the constitutions of one of the original States there appeared this declaration: "That a frequent recurrence to the principles of the constitution is one of the things absolutely necessary to preserve the advantages of liberty and to maintain a free government." The high character of those who framed this declaration and the solemn circumstances under which it was uttered constitute my defense for taking it as a text on this day. I am well aware of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that under present conditions the Constitution is often sneered at instead of revered. But the utterance above quoted was made in the earlier days of the Republic, when the memory of the Revolution was fresh in the minds of men and when tyranny and oppression were hated and feared. Even in that day the patriot fathers looking into the future realized that a time might come when, under the stress of war or under the temptations of peace, the people might be inclined to forget the great principles that hallow and make sacred our Constitution and the great purposes that inspired its authors.

It is not my purpose to indulge in any abuse of the President of the United States. My respect for the high office he holds as the chief citizen of the mightiest of all nations, would forbid my doing so. And then I gladly accord to him full credit for all that he has done to secure better laws and to provide for their better enforcement; for the curbing of corporations; for the protection of the weak against the strong; for the gospel of honor and honesty that he has preached, and for his efforts to uplift our national character. But while justice to him requires that this be said, justice to the Constitution requires that it be also said that he has done more toward tempting our people to forget its precepts and to trample upon its limitations than all the Presidents from Washington to Roosevelt.

The first resolution adopted in the Constitutional Convention was that there should be established a National Government to be composed of three departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. The Constitution makers had lived under a government where a king was supreme. They had felt the force and the power of a tyrannical and an oppressive government. They had been denied the right of representation, though compelled to bear the burdens of the government; they had been without courts empowered to preserve their rights of property or to protect their liberties and their lives. As they could look neither to the King, nor to Parliament, nor to the courts for relief, they appealed to the god of battles. Then followed the days of the Confederation, when there was no national authority, when there was no Executive, when Congress was powerless to enforce its enactments, when there was no common judiciary system, when confusion brooded over all, and when despair filled every heart; under these conditions they met through their Delegates to devise a permanent system of government. Washington was chosen to preside. The Colonies counseled together and finally said in effect, "We are now independent sovereignties. We want to form a Federal Union. We will each surrender a certain part of our sovereignty to this Federal Union, giving it only such powers as we may expressly name and reserving to ourselves all the powers not bestowed. We will divide the powers that we give into three parts. One of these parts we will call the 'legislative department,' and it shall have power to legislate; one of the parts we will call the 'judicial department,' and it shall have the power to interpret the laws, and a third department we will call the 'executive department,' which shall have the power to execute the laws." And then they said that Congress could do certain things and no more, and the judicial department could do certain things and no more, and that the President should have the power to do certain things and no more. In establishing the Federal Union upon this basis our fathers had the experience of the past to guide them. Looking back they could trace the history of nation after nation that had risen and fallen. From that past came the views of some of the world's wisest and best to counsel them. They were familiar with the words of Montesquieu, who said:

> When the legislative and executive powers are in the same person or in the same body of magistrates, there can be no liberty, lest the same monarch should enact tyrannical laws or execute them in a tyrannical manner.

Among the framers of our Constitution were many who were learned in the law, and these revered the name of Blackstone, who said:

> In all tyrannical government the supreme magistracy or the right both of making and enforcing laws is vested in the same man or the same body of men, and wherever these two powers are united together there can be no public liberty.

And so the splendid men of that splendid age, with these experiences of their own, with these examples of others to warn them, and with these admonitions to instruct them, solemnly declared that there should be three separate and distinct powers in our Government. But even when this division was first made there were misgivings and fears that there would be some interruptions in the harmony of their operation. Jefferson said:

> The first principles of good government is certainly a distribution of its powers into executive, judicial, and legislative.

And then he warned that—

> If the three great powers of government maintain their independence of each other it may last long, but not so if either can assume the authority of the other.

And then he prophesied that the—> Tyranny of the legislature is really the danger most to be feared, and will be for many years to come. The tyranny of the executive power will come in its turn, but at a more distant period.

Mr. Chairman, in the brief period of our existence as a Republic our people have seen both of these prophecies of Jefferson come true. There was a time when the legislative department of this Government usurped the authority of the executive and almost defied the power of the judiciary, but this was after our country had been rent by war, when men were maddened by the passions of strife and drunk with the wine of victory. But that condition was but temporary. A better day came at last when the Supreme Court, asserting again its dignity and exercising again the great function given to it of passing upon the constitutionality of legislative enactments, struck down these tyrannical and oppressive acts of Congress and restored the symmetry of our Government.

The country has witnessed during the past few years a more flagrant, a more inexcusable, and more dangerous usurpation of power by the President. It has been more flagrant because more deliberate, more inexcusable because it has occurred in times of peace, more dangerous because it has occurred almost without protest. It is sad to see the rights of a people destroyed by force, but it is sadder to see them surrendered. The people who have virtue enough to fight for the preservation of their country's institutions may in time have the power to restore them, but the people who will almost approvingly witness the subversion of the principles of their Government are hopelessly doomed. It can not be said that our people have not been warned of the dangers resulting when one department of our Government attempts to exercise the functions of another. Mr. Madison long ago said:

> If it be a fundamental principle of free government that the legislative, executive, and judicial powers should be separately exercised, it is equally so that they be independently exercised.

Then, in the Federalist it was said:

> The accumulation of all powers—legislative, executive, and judiciary—in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may be justly pronounced the very definition of tyranny.

Then, Mr. Story, in his treatise on the Constitution, said:

> Power, however, is of an encroaching nature, and it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limit assigned to it. Having separated the three great powers by a broad line from each other, the difficult task remains to provide some practical means for the security of each against the meditated or occasional invasions of the others. Is it sufficient to declare on parchment—in the Constitution—that each shall remain and neither shall usurp the functions of the other? No one well read in history during the period of the existence of our State constitutions will place much reliance on such declarations. In the first place, men may and will differ as to the nature and the extent of the prohibition. Their wishes and their interests, the prevalence of faction, an apparent necessity, or a predominant popularity will give a strong bias to their judgments and easily satisfy them with reasoning which has but a plausible coloring, and it has been accordingly found that the theory has bent under the occasional pressure as well as under the occasional elasticity of public opinion, and as well in the States as in the General Government under the Federation. Usurpations of power have been notoriously assumed by particular departments in each, and it has often happened that these very usurpations have received popular favor and indulgence.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that Mr. Story must have been given the power to peer into the future, because the very conditions against which he sounded the note of warning are upon us. It is true that upon parchment we have declared that the three great departments of our Government shall remain separate and no one shall usurp the functions of the other, but how often during the past ten years have we seen the executive department exercise authority never given to it, and how often have we heard this usurpation excused because of the "predominant popularity" of the President or justified because of some apparent necessity.

Henry Clay, the great Kentuckian, drew a picture of the conditions that now prevail in this Republic when he spoke these words:

> The sum of the whole thing is that there is but one power, one control, one will in the State. All is concentrated in the President. He directs, orders, and commands the whole machinery of the State. Through the official agencies scattered throughout the land and absolutely subject to his will, he executes according to his pleasure or caprice the whole power of the Commonwealth which has been absorbed and engrossed by him, and one sole will * * * predominates and animates the whole of this vast community. If this be not practical despotism, I am incapable of conceiving or defining it.

There is one more authority to which I shall appeal, an authority that ought still to be venerated. There was once a man who led the tattered armies of the patriots through eight long years of war, who presided over the convention that framed the Constitution, who was called twice to the Presidency to direct the course of the young Republic amidst the awful dangers of its early days; and when he was about to retire from public life to the comforts of his home at Mount Vernon, he gave to his people a Farewell Address. I beg you to-day to listen to these words of Washington; of Washington the soldier; of Washington the statesman; of Washington the patriot:

It is important likewise that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power by dividing and distributing it into different depositories and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and some under our own eyes. To preserve them is as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or the modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates; but let there be no change by usurpation, for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Would, Mr. Chairman, that there might be some power that could reanimate the dust of him who sleeps in that tomb upon the slopes of Mount Vernon so that his mighty voice again might be heard to stir our people from the sleep of death into which they are falling. Let me emphasize this sentence from that address:

If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

Mr. Chairman, the excuse that has been uniformly offered by those who would defend the usurpation of power by the President is that it is done in behalf of some good purpose, to serve some worthy end or to meet some great necessity. But Washington answered this when he said:

Let there be no change by usurpation, for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

The exercise of arbitrary power by any man or at any time is dangerous, but it is tenfold more dangerous when exercised by a good man or to serve some good purpose. If such a power should be exercised by a bad man, he would be despised; if exercised in a bad cause, he would be destroyed; but when exercised by a man strong in the affections of the people or for a good cause, such usurpations are molded into precedents to be followed by both good and bad, as well as for both noble and ignoble ends. No virtue however great, no purpose however high can justify usurpation by the President. God forbid that we should elect a bad man President, but a bad man who would respect the limitations of the Constitution would be far less dangerous to the future of our country than the present occupant of the White House.

Mr. Chairman, when one considers the magnitude of the powers lawfully possessed by the President he is inclined to wonder how he could desire more. He is the Commander in Chief of the United States Army and Navy, with all the authority and power that this means. He has the power to make treaties, subject to approval by the Senate, and can thus affect the relationship between this and other countries. He appoints our representatives to foreign governments and through them has the ear of every ruler in civilized lands. In the Government service are 300,000 officials. Of these 100,000 are appointed by him or by those under him. These officials are to be found in every section of our country echoing his sentiments and voicing his views.

In every one of them the President has an evangelist proclaiming his virtues and magnifying his greatness. Then he has the constitutional power to recommend legislation to Congress and thus influence the legislative branch. He has, in addition, the veto power. Every act passed by Congress is submitted to him. He has the power to disapprove it and to destroy it unless Congress should pass it by the requisite vote over his veto. In a sense he is connected with the judicial department, for he has the power under the Constitution of appointment. Since Mr. Roosevelt has been President he has appointed three of the nine judges of the Supreme Court. He has appointed a majority of the circuit judges of the United States. He has appointed a majority of the district judges. Drawing their authority from him, holding their commissions under him, he is in a position to wield a powerful influence over them, though they are representatives of a distinct branch of the Government and supposed to be independent of him. Then he has all the prestige and power that go with the high office of President. The fact that he is President makes his voice a voice of power and his influence tremendous throughout the world. The utterance of Mr. Roosevelt, as Mr. Roosevelt, before he was vested with Presidential power was no more potent for evil and no more powerful for good than the utterance of any one of thousands of other men, but when he becomes President of the United States his voice is no longer the voice of Roosevelt, the man, but is the voice of Roosevelt, the spokesman for 80,000,000 of people.

The idlest whisper from his lips circles the globe, and an expression of an opinion by him upon governmental subjects affects the trade, the industries, and the thoughts of the entire world. The truth is that he wields under the Constitution as it is a greater power than that exercised by any constitutional ruler in the world. France and Switzerland have Presidents, but they wield only a small part of the power possessed by the President of the United States. England has a King and Germany an Emperor, but neither King nor Emperor can direct the policies of his people or control the affairs of his Government as completely as can the President of the United States. It has been well said that in constitutional monarchies the kings reign, but do not govern, while in the United States the President governs, but does not reign.

So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that any patriotic man who is President of the United States, who wields the tremendous power possessed by the President, ought to be content with the possession of these legal powers, and ought not to reach out with eager and grasping ambition and attempt to usurp the powers given to the other departments of the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But if it be said that the President has not all the power that in right and justice belongs to his great position, if the course of events has demonstrated that in order to preserve the rights of the people or to protect the Government against the evil designs of malefactors of any kind more power should be given to the President, I answer that even under these conditions the people are not helpless. They have the power in a way prescribed by the Constitution itself, by constitutional amendment, to clothe him with additional authority. And, Mr. Chairman, after all, the constitutional way is the only safe way. The constitutional path is the only one a President of the United States should seek to travel. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But the citizen who now occupies the Presidential chair is not content, it seems, to exercise only the power that Washington exercised, that Jefferson exercised, that Jackson exercised, that Lincoln and Grant and McKinley exercised, but, driven by a reckless and unreasoning ambition, he is striving to center in himself powers not dreamed of by them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

From what source does he get the authority he exercises? How does he justify himself in its use? He presents two theories. In his public utterances he proclaims the doctrine that there is an inherent power which belongs to all sovereign nations, a power distinct from and beyond anything conferred by constitutions, a power not vested in him by the written words of our Constitution, but that somehow, in some way, there has been given to him to use for his country's good this mysterious and limitless authority. I deny the existence of any such power. The tenth amendment to the Constitution repudiates its existence when it says:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Then for a hundred years the Supreme Court has been holding that the United States Government possesses only the powers given to it expressly, and such powers by implication as are necessary to make effective the express powers. Within the past few months, in the case of Kansas v. Colorado, the Supreme Court, speaking through Judge Brewer, denounced the Rooseveltian doctrine of "inherent power" when it said:

Counsel for the Government relies upon the doctrine of sovereign or inherent power. * * * But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the nation as a whole, which belong to, though not expressed in, the great powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a Government of enumerated powers. That this is such a Government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specific things made operative to grant other and distinct things.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, the President will be permitted to enjoy alone the doubtful distinction of advocating the pernicious doctrine of "inherent sovereignty." While his first theory is dangerous, his second is wicked. In 1906 he said that—

We need through * * * judicial interpretation and construction of law to increase the power of the Federal Government.

It is, of course, important to our country to have wise men for our Presidents; it is important to have patriotic men for our legislators, but it is far more important to have as our judges men not only wise and patriotic, but also incorruptible and independent. The lapse of time will end the authority of a vicious President; the wrath of the people can drive from power a faithless representative, but our experience has shown that nothing less than the act of God can free us from the scourge of a degenerate judge. A long time ago Judge Marshall said:

The judiciary department comes home in its effects to every man's fireside; it passes on his property, his reputation, his life, his all. Is it not in the last degree important that he (a judge) should be rendered perfectly and completely independent, with nothing to control him but God and his own conscience? I have always thought, from my earliest youth until now, that the greatest scourge an angry heaven ever inflicted upon an ungrateful and sinning people was an ignorant, a corrupt, or a dependent judiciary.

I have already referred to the appointment of Federal judges by the President, and the large number already appointed by Mr. Roosevelt. By the declaration above quoted that the power of the Federal Government must be increased "Through judicial interpretation and construction of law," he has served notice upon every applicant for a Federal judgeship that he must embrace this heresy and has appealed to every one already invested by his preference in judicial robes to so construe the Constitution and the law as to give to the Executive a power never possessed before. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. With pleasure.

Mr. HARDWICK. While the gentleman is on that particular line of discussion, I want to inquire of him what his opinion is of the action of the President not very long ago in causing the publication to be made of his desire about a certain sentence to be imposed on a man in the District of Columbia, named Harper, who had been convicted in one of the Federal courts?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I intended to call the attention of the House to that case, and now is an opportune time. If concrete illustration were needed of the danger and folly of the attempted exercise of powers by the President not belonging to him, this case most abundantly affords it. Let us look at it for a moment. The Harper case is unimportant in itself, but it is important in illustrating what the President attempts to do. From the press reports, it appears that this case was pending in the police court of the city of Washington, the judge of which court is appointed by the President.

Mr. SULZER. And his term is soon to expire.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. And I am informed that his term is soon to expire. I do not know about that.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is right, I think.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. A citizen of the District of Columbia was arraigned before that court, tried, and convicted of a violation of the pure-food law. The responsibility rested upon that judge to impose the penalty. The attorney appearing for the District was a representative of the judicial department of this Government, as was the judge. This country had presented to it a few days ago, according to newspaper accounts, the spectacle of the President summoning to the White House the prosecuting attorney for this district and issuing to him his commands that he should insist upon a prison penalty for that offense. It matters not whether Harper was innocent or guilty, the action of the President was equally indefensible. Let us assume that the verdict of the jury was a just verdict and that he was guilty and deserved a prison sentence, yet it would be infinitely better for this country for Harper to violate the pure-food statute and escape punishment than for the President of the United States to trample under foot the spirit of our Constitution by an attempt to dictate to an officer of a different department of this Government what he should or should not do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will yield for just one other suggestion? If we are to believe the newspapers, the President not only made this suggestion to the district attorney, but he also caused it to be published as coming from the Executive Office, so that the judge might see it himself.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Of course. There is one thing peculiar about the President; he never does anything that he does not cause to be published. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us see just to what length this proposition can be carried. In the first place, the pardoning power is vested in the President, and Harper, if finally sent to prison, will have the constitutional right to appeal to the President for pardon.

Could the President consistently grant a pardon to a man whose sentence he himself pronounced? Then, if the President has a right to dictate to the district attorney in the police courts of Washington, he has the right to dictate to every district attorney in the United States. If he has the right to suggest to the judge of the police court of the District of Columbia, he has the right to suggest to every district judge, every circuit judge, and every Supreme judge in the United States. If it is proper for the President to suggest to the courts that in certain instances severe penalties should be imposed, it is equally proper that he suggest when no penalty should be imposed. If a good President should be allowed to dictate to a court in order to punish the guilty, what assurance have we that some bad President in the future may not direct the court to punish the innocent? If the President has the right to do this in a Federal court, the governor of every State has the right to do it in the State courts. But, Mr. Chairman, you do not have to follow out the argument to its limit to understand just how foolish, how indefensible, and how dangerous it is for the President to interfere in such a manner.

Let me call your attention briefly to another case. A few weeks ago there was presented in the House of Representatives, by Mr. WALDO, of New York, charges against a Federal judge in China. The House referred these charges to the Judiciary Committee for examination. That committee began its task of calling witnesses and taking testimony. Soon after that examination began the President issued a manifesto and, according to newspaper reports, sent it to the Judiciary Committee of this House, in which he declared that the judge was innocent of every charge preferred against him and said:

It is clear that Judge Wilfley is attacked not because he has done evil but because he has done good.

And, further, that—

The assault on him is simply an impeachment of decency and zeal for the public good.

I do not know whether Judge Wilfley is innocent or guilty. I hope that he is innocent. But this House is given "the sole power of impeachment" and charges looking to the impeachment of this judge had been filed in the House.

The members of the Judiciary Committee were investigating the facts under their oaths as Members of this House, and I declare to you that the issuance by the President of that letter of acquittal and its transmission to the House and its committee at such a time and under such circumstances was an insult to the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is it or is it not true that charges were preferred against Judge Wilfley and brought to the notice of the President and State Department——

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I understand your question and what you mean. It is true——

Mr. DRISCOLL. If that is so, why were not the President and the State Department justified in examining those charges and settling them and making their report at any time they wished? Was not the matter and their duty entirely independent from the impeachment proceedings in the House?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Charges were filed with the President against Judge Wilfley. They were filed direct and answer to such charges could have been made direct and not through the newspapers. Then these charges were filed with the President about November 19, 1907. The remainder of November, all of December, January, and February passed without any public declaration from the President. About February 20 this House obtained jurisdiction. It was soon after this that the President, in effect, said to the House and to the committee: "You shall not exercise the power given you by the Constitution to try this case upon its merits, but under the authority granted me by my 'big stick,' I say to you that this man must be exonerated." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But even if all these three and one-half months had been needed by the President to examine into this case and reach his conclusions, an ordinary sense of propriety and respect for a coordinate branch of the Government would have prompted him to have withheld it a little while longer and to have permitted this great committee and this House to have examined into this case and to have rendered judgment upon the merits.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] can not evade the proposition nor escape the conclusion that this message to that committee was simply wielding the "big stick" over their heads and over the membership of this House. I have one sincere regret, and that is that the Judiciary Committee of the House did not, in defense of its high prerogative and authority, assert a spirit of lofty and American-like independence by sending back to the President this letter that was an insult to this House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not know of this letter being sent to the Judicary, and I am not betraying any committee secrets when I say that testimony adduced before the subcommittee, which has been reported to the full committee, indicating most thoroughly that the President sent his letter to the wrong party; that instead of sending it to the House and to the Committee on the Judiciary and endeavoring to whitewash this judge, he should have sent it to the judge, calling for his resignation and removing him from office. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I know nothing of the facts beyond newspaper reports, and I am not attempting to pass upon the guilt or innocence of Judge Wilfley, but I am attempting to call the attention of the country to the danger that would result should the President succeed in exercising all the powers of the three departments of this Government. If he can properly influence the House to acquit an innocent man, he might improperly persuade the House to acquit a guilty man or to impeach an innocent man.

But, Mr. Chairman, after all the President may not be so much to blame for usurpation of legislative functions. The Senate and the House are to blame for permitting him to do so. They are to blame because they have folded their hands, have surrendered the authority given them by the Constitution, and fall prostrate at the feet of the President. Ah, Mr. Chairman, I believe that there was a time when the legislative department dared to assert the dignity and independence that belonged to it, but that time is in the past. The House and the Senate today seem to exist simply for the purpose of registering the will of the President. It has been so for the five years I have been here. It is useless to multiply examples to prove it. Take the rate bill of two years ago. You know how every movement that was made was dictated by the President. I will agree that, as passed, it was an improvement upon the old law. I know that it afforded the people some needed relief. But why could not the Senate and the House have considered it, free from the Executive interference and dictation, and perhaps under such conditions a measure might have been perfected that would have given the people still more relief. But it would have been better for Congress to have performed its functions, even though the product of its labor might have been cruder in form and less satisfactory in its operation than for the President to assume the functions of legislation.

Take the conditions prevailing now. For the past week or two the news has been coming out of the White House that the President was preparing a new antitrust bill, in which he proposed to distinguish between good and bad trusts. I suppose that his idea of a good trust is one that contributed to his campaign fund in 1904. But where does he get the authority to prepare legislation and then to submit it to some meek and submissive Member to be offered here for enactment into law? Why not complete the farce by authorizing him to come "booted and spurred" into this and that other Chamber and declare that his will shall be the law? The truth is that we in the House are in a state of double slavery, slavery to the Speaker and to the Committee on Rules; and they in turn are but the obedient servants of the President's will. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We stand astounded at the quickness with which these haughty autocrats of this House transform themselves into fawning sycophants in the presence of their master. But occasionally he smiles upon them. In one of the Washington papers a few days ago I noticed that after the antitrust measure had been finished at the White House, the President kindly invited certain Members of the House and Senate up to the White House to inspect what he had prepared for enactment by Congress. [Applause.] A more disgraceful exhibition of abdication of authority by Congress and a more disgusting instance of usurpation by the President was never witnessed. Congress is no longer the legislative department. It is simply a machine to record the will of the man at the other end of the Avenue. The Senate and the House of Representatives do not deserve any more of the respect of the people of this Republic than they receive. Of course, the President does not respect them. He despises them as belonging to the "mollycoddle" class. The people just as well understand that there is but one power in control of the Government now, and that is the President. He makes the laws because he dictates to and controls the men who should make them. He interprets the laws because he appoints and influences the men who should interpret them. He executes the laws all by himself. Instead of having a Government in three departments, we have three departments in one man, and Roosevelt is the one man.

I clipped from a paper a few days ago an item describing the examination of two foreigners applying for citizenship in New Jersey. I will read it:

"Who makes the laws for the United States?" Assistant United States District Attorney Gregg asked Adam Canalsey, applicant for naturalization, in court here this morning. "Roosevelt," said Canalsey, promptly. "Is there no other governing power?" "No." "What body makes the laws for the United States?" was the way the question was put to John Remar, the next candidate. "Roosevelt," he said.

And so it is. Roosevelt makes the laws and interprets them and executes them and suspends them at his own pleasure and will.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. In the antitrust measure he proposes to be given the constitutional and legal discretion to suspend them.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. It would be only a useless formality to give him a power that he will exercise without authority whenever it serves his purpose to do so. In his message of yesterday he served notice upon the House that—

If you pass certain measures in a certain way, I will veto them.

The next breeze that comes from the White House will probably bring the message that if this Congress does not bow in willing obedience to his demand for four battle ships, he will veto measures providing for public buildings or for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who regard the slightest utterance of the President as oracular in its wisdom, nor am I one of those who would deprive him of all credit for the virtues he may possess. He sometimes does good things in a way to make them look bad, and he sometimes does bad things in a way to make them look good. He sometimes thinks without acting, and oftentimes acts without thinking. [Laughter and applause.]

He is sometimes right and sometimes wrong, but always picturesque.

He is patriotic enough occasionally to seize upon some of the policies of his political opponents and use them to his country's good, and sometimes partisan enough to cling to the policies of his own to his country's harm.

He is the apostle of simplicity. He believes in the simple life and simplified spelling.

He is ambidextrous. He wields the "big stick" in one hand and a fountain pen in the other and creates equal havoc with each. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

When he gets into action his enemies are in danger and his friends in peril. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

He is fickle in his affections. In 1904 the name of Harriman in the code book of the White House was "Donation." In 1908 it is "Damnation." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

He is a broncho buster and a trust buster, the difference being that when he breaks a broncho he blindfolds the horse, and when he attempts to "bust" a trust he blindfolds himself. [Laughter and applause.]

He is a nature student. He has counted all the stripes around the body of a mountain lion, but he has never seen a stripe upon one of the trust magnates.

He is a great hunter. He can draw the finest bead upon a bobcat, but he can not get a sight on the Constitution. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

He is progressive. For years he chased the bears, and now he is chasing both the "bulls" and the "bears."

He is trusting. He took "In God we trust" from the coins and then trusted 200,000,000 of them to the banks in New York. [Laughter and applause.]

He is a contradiction. He declaims against race suicide, but he insists on keeping the tariff on safety pins and baby buggies. [Laughter and applause.]

He cultivates the artistic. He whitewashed Paul Morton and is now frescoing the reactionaries with a tint of blue.

He is perverse. He was given the Vice-Presidency in the hope that he would bury himself, but has constantly refused to deport himself as a well-disposed corpse should.

He can see a war cloud in the heavens before breakfast, but gets color-blind about lunch time. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

In the South he has more admirers than supporters, and in the North he has more supporters than admirers. [Laughter and applause.]

He can make a noise like a politician. He discharged the colored troop of soldiers in an off year, when they committed murder, and now recommends their restoration in an election year. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

He is generous. Given the power, with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties, he is willing to relieve this body of its onerous duty and do it all himself.

He is a magician. He can transform our Uncle Joe, who is a roaring lion in the House, into a purring kitten in the White House. [Laughter and applause.]

He is sympathetic. When he sees the Senate suffering from ennui he gives it diversion by permitting it to eat out of his hand.

He is considerate. He permits the Supreme Court to construe a part of the laws a part of the time, instead of himself construing all the laws all of the time.

He is thoughtful. Instead of introducing into this House legislation prepared by himself, he permits the "Carnation Club" of the House to look over the finished product. [Laughter and applause.]

He is the Sandow of the century. He can hold the Senate in one hand and the House in the other and keep both of them in the air most of the time. [Renewed laughter.]

He is a patriot. Realizing from past observations that his party oftentimes makes mistakes in nominating its candidate for the Presidency, he is seeking to relieve it of that responsibility and is making the nomination himself.

He is the strangest combination of wisdom and folly, of honesty and obstinacy, of patriot and politician, of courage and rashness, and of the spectacular and the grotesque that this Republic ever saw, and just what niche he is to occupy in the temple of his country's history God and the future alone can tell. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000; one solicitor, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,500, and $500 additional as custodian of buildings; private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,500; stenographer and executive clerk to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,000; private secretary to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $1,600; stenographer to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $1,400; one appointment clerk, $2,000; one chief of supply division, $2,000; one inspector, $2,000; one telegraph and telephone operator, $1,400; one telegraph and telephone operator, $1,200; one clerk, class 4; three clerks, class 3; five clerks, class 2; seven clerks, class 1; five clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, $900 each; one clerk, $840; six clerks or laborers, at $720 each; one chief engineer, who shall be captain of the watch, $1,600; three assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; four firemen, at $720 each; four elevator conductors, at $720 each; one cabinetmaker, $1,100; one carpenter, $1,000; one electrician, $1,000; one painter, $900; one painter, $720; one plumber, $900; one blacksmith, $840; one lieutenant of the watch, $1,000; fifteen watchmen, at $720 each; one mechanic, $1,100; seven clerks or messengers, at $840 each; two assistant messengers, at $720 each; two assistant messengers, at $600 each; one assistant messenger, $480; one skilled laborer, $840; one skilled laborer, $720; one skilled laborer, $660; three skilled laborers, at $600 each; one skilled laborer, $480; one laborer, $600; eleven laborers or charwomen, at $480 each; one charwoman, $540; five charwomen, at $240 each; for extra laborers, emergency employments, and pay of rents, $7,600; in all, $132,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve a point of order against some increases in this paragraph: In line 11, page 1, one solicitor at $4,000; line 12, page 1, and line 1, page 2, "and $500 additional as custodian of buildings;" lines 21 and 22, on page 2, "one cabinetmaker, $1,100;" and lines 24 and 25, "one painter at $750."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the salaries of the solicitors of the other Departments of the Government range from $4,500 to $5,000. In the general post-office the assistant attorney is paid $4,500. In the Department of the Interior he is paid $5,000. The Solicitor for the Treasury, the Solicitor for the Department of State, for the Department of Commerce and Labor, and for the Office of Internal Revenue are paid $4,500 each; so that the present salary of the solicitor for the Department of Agriculture is $1,000 lower than the salary of officials of corresponding rank in the other Departments. It seemed to your committee, in view of the fact that the passage of the pure-food law and of other laws has imposed a large additional burden upon the solicitor for this Department, that it was certainly not unfair to increase his salary $500, where it would still be that much below the salary paid to similar officials in the other Departments. As to the office of chief clerk, I would like to call attention to the fact that $500 is added to his salary because he is made custodian of the new building, and that is the salary that is paid for such service in all the other bureaus. In every Department of the Government, except the Department of Agriculture, the salary of the chief clerk now is $3,000, while in the War Department and in the Department of State an increase of $1,000 has been recommended. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman will withdraw his point of order, and if he does not I should like to be heard a moment on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. When he speaks of the solicitor and the solicitors in the other Departments, what other Department does the gentleman refer to that has a solicitor?

Mr. SCOTT. The Department of State, of the Treasury, and of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. ROBERTS. And the Navy Department has one also.

Mr. SCOTT. I think there is a solicitor in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. MANN. There are several solicitors in connection with the Treasury Department authorized by law.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And the salaries fixed. Is there any authorization of law for this place at all?

Mr. SCOTT. Except as it is made from year to year in the appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. It is a new place made a few years ago, a very few years ago.

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly; it is not in existence except as it is carried from year to year on the appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no special occasion for its existence, is there?

Mr. SCOTT. It is highly important that there should be a law officer in connection with the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Then, why does not the gentleman's committee provide for an Assistant Attorney-General of the United States for the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. SCOTT. For many years there has been employed in the Department and carried on the appropriation bill what was known as a law clerk. Some three years ago that designation was changed to solicitor, which was thought to cover the case. This officer is employed to do very important work. He is occupied daily with questions growing out of the enforcement of the pure-food law. It is his duty to visé all contracts that are entered into by the Department, and to prepare all the cases to be submitted to the Attorney-General of the United States connected with violation of the law, the enforcement of which is specially placed in charge of the Department of Agriculture; so that I am sure he finds himself occupied all of the time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have no doubt about that. He finds his time occupied, so far as my observation goes, and I have had some occasion to be observant on the subject, and I think that a large share of his duty is to hinder the enforcement of the pure-food law instead of enforcing the pure-food law. He ought to have nothing to do with it, in my judgment.

Mr. SCOTT. Of course that is a matter of administration with which this committee has nothing to do.

Mr. MANN. Well, I suppose that is true.

Mr. SCOTT. The committee has felt that as long as this officer was in the Department, coming into it by appointment in the regular way, he was entitled to at least something near the salary that is paid officials of similar rank in other Departments.

Mr. MANN. Well, this official was a law clerk and came into the Department as a law clerk, and I suppose at a salary of considerably less than $2,000. In the course of time it was determined to give this official some added compensation, and thereupon, without any authorization of law, there was a proposition made to call him a solicitor. He was the same individual and his salary was raised, I think, to $3,000; subsequently, or perhaps at the same time, to $3,500. I believe that is the salary he now receives. Now the proposition is to make his salary $4,000. If the Department of Agriculture had provided for it a solicitor, to be appointed as other solicitors are by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, doubtless this official would not be named for the place. He is not, in my opinion, the caliber of man for such a position as that.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Is it not a fact by reason of the enactment and enforcement of the pure-food law, in which the gentleman took considerable interest, that the labors of the solicitor have been increased very largely and the possibilities of his office made much greater?

Mr. MANN. I think likely that is true.

Mr. BURLESON. And the discharge of his duties made much more onerous?

Mr. MANN. I think the pure-food law, as I said before, would be far better enforced if this official had nothing to do with it, and that he has perhaps most of the time been hindering the enforcement of the pure-food law instead of enforcing the law.

Mr. BURLESON. That is not the view the Secretary of Agriculture takes.

Mr. MANN. That may be. I have the greatest respect and affection for the Secretary of Agriculture, but in this particular case I do not happen to agree with him. I think there ought to be in that Department a solicitor attached to the Bureau that has to deal with the enforcement of the pure-food law who would himself give attention to the trial of pure-food cases, a thing which this solicitor never has done. He does not prepare cases that are to be tried in the courts to enforce the pure-food law, and knows nothing in regard to them.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to inquire whether the gentleman from New York insists upon his point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I insist. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this fact: It has been asserted that we are threatened with a deficit of $100,000,000 in the present fiscal year. The deficit to-day is over $30,000,000, unless I am greatly mistaken. This bill carries about $1,000,000 more than the estimates——

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not——

Mr. SCOTT. He clearly is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know the gentleman pointed out in his report that certain supplemental estimates were submitted, but they were not submitted in accordance with the law. The law requires that no supplemental estimates shall be submitted unless because of some emergency that has arisen since the time the estimates are submitted in pursuance to the statutes, and in that case the Secretary, or whoever submitted the estimates, must state the reason why the estimates were not submitted when the regular estimates were submitted to Congress. I do not think the gentleman will contend that this provision of the statute has been observed in regard to the estimate of $2,000,000 for improvement of national forests, for examining applications for homesteads within national forests $100,000, and the other items which make the estimates according to his report exceed the amount carried by this bill, for this bill does carry in round numbers about $1,000,000 more than the estimates submitted to Congress in pursuance of the statute. Now, if all the committees which have jurisdiction over appropriation bills were to bring in about 10 per cent more than the amounts estimated by the Departments, instead of reducing or refusing to give the $100,000,000 asked by the Department, so as to bring the expenditures within the revenues, we would appropriate for the next fiscal year about $200,000,000 in excess of the contemplated revenues.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is certainly mistaken in his assertion that the supplemental estimates which have come before the committee did not come in compliance with the law. They came in the usual way. I hold one of them in my hand, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture submitting an estimate of appropriation for enforcement of the act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroads or other means of transportation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the Secretary state in his communication his reasons for not submitting that estimate with the regular estimates?

Mr. SCOTT. The letter is as follows:

I beg to request that you will transmit to Congress, as a supplemental estimate from this Department, the following item of $25,000 to cover necessary expenses for collecting evidence and securing enforcement of the act of June 29, 1906.

Then follows the paragraph he wishes to have inserted in the bill. The Secretary of Agriculture then adds:

Since August, 1906, the inspectors of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture have reported over 1,200 violations of this law.

Does the gentleman desire me to read the rest of that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am waiting for the part of the letter that complies with the statute.

Mr. SCOTT. I will read further:

The collection of evidence in cases under the law involves the expenditure of a considerable amount of money, which subsequently is returned to the Treasury in the shape of fines and costs. Violations are reported in the first instance by inspectors of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

And the remainder of the letter continues in the same vein. It seems to me, to reply to the gentleman's suggestion in regard to the fulfillment of the law, that it is made sufficiently clear in the statement of the Secretary that an emergency has arisen which could not have been anticipated when the estimates were made up in August.

Now, I would like to call attention also to a paragraph in the original estimates which were submitted to the committee and appear in the Book of Estimates in connection with the Bureau of Forestry, as follows:

The appropriation of $500,000 for the administration, protection, and development of the national forests, together with its several provisos, have been omitted, as the provisos are continuing legislation, and as a separate estimate will be submitted for such money as may be necessary for the administration, protection, and development of the national forests.

Notice was given at that time that a supplemental estimate would be sent in later, and that supplemental estimate was sent in, amounting to $2,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, I shall call the gentleman's attention to the statute which the Secretary of Agriculture did not comply with in submitting those estimates. In the legislative act of June 22, 1906, is this provision:

Hereafter the heads of the several Executive Departments, and all other officers authorized or required to make estimates for the public service, shall include in their annual estimates furnished the Secretary of the Treasury for inclusion in the Book of Estimates all estimates of appropriations already required for the service for the fiscal year for which they are prepared and submitted, and special or additional estimates for that fiscal year shall only be submitted to carry out laws subsequently enacted or when deemed imperatively necessary for the public service by the Department in which they shall originate, in which case such special or additional estimate shall be accomplished by a full statement of its imperative necessity and reasons for its omission in the annual estimates.

I have glanced hastily at the supplemental estimates, and I undertake to say that anybody who examines them and examines this provision of the act of 1906 will realize in a moment that the Secretary has not complied with the provisions of that act.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think the Secretary has complied literally with the provisions of that act. I have just read the letter of transmittal in which he submits a supplemental estimate to cover the expense of collecting evidence to enforce the act of June 29, 1906. Another estimate was for $60,000 to provide for the restoration of a building at the weather station at Mount Weather, Virginia, which was destroyed by fire after the estimates were submitted last August.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a different case.

Mr. SCOTT. Another estimate was one for $100,000 for surveys of homestead tracts within the national forests, and that also was an emergency, because it was not known until after the original estimates were submitted that applications for such surveys would come in such numbers as to make it impossible for the present force to meet them as rapidly as the interests of the people demand that they should be met. Furthermore, the law of last year required the Secretary in submitting the estimate for the improvement of the forests to submit with it a detailed estimate of the amount that was to be expended in each forest and the purpose for which it was to be expended.

It was impossible for the Department to prepare the estimates in the great detail required by the law at the time the original estimates were submitted. Notice was given to that effect when these estimates were submitted, and the supplemental estimates came in as soon as the Department could prepare them. I insist, therefore, that the Secretary has complied with the law, and the committee was absolutely right in regarding these estimates as of the same character as though submitted when the original estimates were sent down.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will permit me. I think it is clear that the statute quoted by the gentleman from New York is directory; anyway it is not a mandatory statute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is a mandatory statute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no penalty attached to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not make it directory.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is a directory statute in its very nature. Congress has authority to make appropriations without any estimates at all, and the estimates required by that statute are purely advisory and for the convenience of Congress in making up the annual budgets. The head of a Department may make his annual estimates and supplemental estimates as he sees fit for the instruction of the Congress. Congress may follow the estimates and it may absolutely discard them. It may make provision for supplemental appropriations whether in harmony with law or not. I think it is purely directory and not mandatory. There is nothing compulsory about it. It is simply a legislative request that the head of the Department make these estimates for the information of Congress in making up the annual budget.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman mean that when Congress enacts a law that estimates shall be submitted in a certain way it is merely a request and not binding upon the head of a Department?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Most certainly it is. The gentleman is a lawyer and knows the difference between a directory and mandatory statute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have examined this statute very closely, and if it is not mandatory I am unable to conceive what a mandatory statute would be.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In the first place it carries no penalty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would make it penal.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It involves, in addition, the fact that it binds nobody; it purports to bind nobody. It is for the information of Congress. That is all. It does not undertake to provide that an appropriation shall or shall not be made.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from Indiana say that if a Secretary of one of the Departments should decline to obey that law he would not be subject to impeachment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He would not.

Mr. MANN. He clearly would.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Congress has no power to encroach upon the executive function, no more than the executive has to enter on the legislative power. There are certain discretions lodged in the Executive Departments, and the Congress can not control them; but that hypothesis is not the one that we are now discussing.

Mr. MANN. I think that is true. It is an academic discussion.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Purely, it is one; but the gentleman assumes to state a moral general law.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, this is a very interesting discussion, but, as the gentleman from Illinois remarked, it is purely academic. As to whether these estimates came down in the way required by law or not, gentlemen may have different opinions; but they came down, the committee considered them, and the bill which is before the House is to be judged upon its merits, I take it, and not upon the proposition whether the estimates were properly submitted.

I have just a few words that I would like to say in response to the criticism of the gentleman from New York as to the alleged extravagance in this bill. I desire to call his attention and that of the House to the fact that the actual increase of this bill over the appropriations for the current year is $1,204,056, while the actual increase in the appropriations for the current year over the appropriations for the preceding fiscal year, 1907, were $2,276,850. As a matter of fact, therefore, the increase in the appropriations carried by this bill over the appropriations for the current year are but little more than half as large as the increase of the current appropriations were over the bill for the preceding fiscal year. I insist, therefore, that this bill has been carefully and conservatively and economically drawn, and that criticism against it on the score of extravagance is not justified.

Now, I should like to have the point of order settled, and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] insists upon it, I should like to say a word on that subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have just come into this Chamber, and I am not familiar with the wording of the matter which is before the committee; but the distinguished lawyer, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], just now made a statement that attracted my attention. As I caught it, it was something like this, that the statute was not mandatory, because no penalty was fixed by the statute. Does the gentleman mean to argue that a statute must have a penalty in order that it may be mandatory?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There must, of course, some right be determined or depend upon the statute; but the criticism I made of the statute quoted by the genleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was regarding the making of annual estimates by the heads of Departments.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I caught all that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I made the statement that the statute was directory and not mandatory.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And the statement I caught—perhaps I did not catch it correctly, but I want to get it correctly—was that the distinguished gentleman said that a statute in order to be mandatory must have a penalty.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not necessarily.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then the gentleman and I quite agree.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This statute had no penalty, and there was nothing depending upon it. There were no conditions attached to it at all, and it was directory in its form. It is not an academic question, because no point of order can be based upon that kind of a statute, anyhow.

Mr. SCOTT. Speaking to the point of order, I recognize that the precedents have been largely in favor of sustaining such a point of order as has just been raised. I do insist, however, that the rulings upon appropriation bills, and particularly upon this appropriation bill, have been inconsistent and illogical. I make that statement with all deference to every Member of the House who has occupied the chair while those rulings were being made. I remember only two or three years ago language was stricken from the agricultural appropriation bill which had been in it for years on the theory that the appropriation act for the current year was not existing law. And yet every year points of order are sustained against increasing salaries on the theory that the current law is existing law. Obviously these two theories are mutually self-destructive. One of them may be right or the other may be right, but by no possibility can both of them be right. My own view of the question is that the appropriation bill is not existing law, for the reason that by the time the bill we are now considering takes effect the current appropriation bill will have passed from the stage forever. Further than that, it seems to me my view of this case is sustained by the following section of the Revised Statutes:

> Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by the Congress from year to year.

It certainly seems to me that no language could make it plainer, and that the appropriation made from year to year must fix the salary of an employee whose salary is not fixed by any other law.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman is aware that the statute provides for a classification of clerks.

Mr. SCOTT. I am.

Mr. MANN. And that the statute to which the gentleman refers does not include anything at all above a clerk.

Mr. SCOTT. It seems to me that the words "other employees" are pretty broad.

Mr. MANN. Ah, that is true; but of course the gentleman is not a lawyer.

Mr. SCOTT. I am sorry that I am not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is a proud addition to his own profession; but with the ordinary construction of law, the words "other employees" do not refer to any higher class of employees than clerks, and can not be made to do so and never have been so held, and nobody has ever construed those words to give authority to employ any higher class of employees than clerks. They were not designed to, clearly.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman's opinion, of course, is entitled to very great weight. I only maintain my own opinion that the statute is susceptible of the interpretation I have given it. I yield, of course, to the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Whatever interpretation the statute may be subject to, if there be any one question well decided under the rules of the House, it is that where no statute fixes the compensation of an employee the rate paid him for the current year, provided in the current law, is the rate of compensation for which Congress can appropriate on an appropriation bill, and any attempt to increase it on an appropriation bill is subject to a point of order.

I would not attempt to reconcile the decisions that have been made under these rules as to what are in violation or what are in conformity with what is known as the "rider rule," but that one point is definitely and well settled and is often insisted upon in this House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course I believe we always have this discussion at the beginning of the consideration of an appropriation bill, as to what is and what is not subject to a point of order. The matter is not one that is open for new consideration, as I understand it. It has been held for years that the current appropriation law does govern the committee as to the salary that is fixed, but does not govern as to the position itself. Now, that is an arbitrary distinction, originally probably without any good reason, but a distinction which has been followed for years, regardless of its origin, and I take it that it is not open to a Chairman now to overrule the long line of decisions upon that point.

Mr. SCOTT. If the long line of decisions have been wrong, ought they not to be overruled?

Mr. MANN. Well, if the long line of decisions has been wrong, it is quite possible that the House, or the committee itself, upon appeal, would be justified in overruling that line of decisions. But no occupant of the chair would feel authorized to do that; and if that line of decisions should be overruled it would put the Appropriation Committees in a much worse fix than they now are.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman made the statement that the salary fixed in appropriation bills is binding upon the committee in relation to the salary without qualification. Is it not true that that rule applies only where the statute authorizing or creating the place fails to fix the salary? If the statute authorizing or creating the position fixes the salary, the salary in the current appropriation bill may be above it.

Mr. MANN. If the law provides for a salary, the law controls it. What I mean to say is, that in the current appropriation bill the salary is taken as existing law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Where the law fixes no salary?

Mr. MANN. Of course the current appropriation bill can not change that. The act of Congress under which this bill comes in is not the one the gentleman refers to, although that would apply to the appointment of clerks in this office, but it is the one which gives the Secretary of Agriculture the power—and this is the original act creating the Department of Agriculture—giving to the Commissioner the power to appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to salaries of similar offices for other Departments of the Government, and he shall, as Congress may from time to time provide, employ other persons for such time as their services may be needed, including chemists, botanists, and entomologists, and other persons skilled in natural science pertaining to agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to ask if the section the gentleman has just referred to does not sufficiently extend the section to which I called the attention of the Chair to eliminate it from the criticism which the gentleman from Illinois made upon it—that it was limited only to the classified employees?

Mr. MANN. A section similar to this is carried in all acts creating the various Departments of the Government. When we drafted the bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor—my friend from New York is not here—perhaps it was his idea—[laughter]—there was a similar provision put in on the theory that as to the ordinary positions Congress would have the authority to put in the officers and provide the salaries. My understanding is that that never has been applied to the creation of a particular office in the first place with a particular salary, and that would be subject to a point of order. The ruling has always been that way I think.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to inquire if the Secretary of Agriculture, whom we all so much admire, has any lawyer or any counsel?

Mr. SCOTT. He has no counselor except the solicitor for the Department.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman means the lawyers in the Department of Justice?

Mr. SCOTT. No, a solicitor for that Department.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Secretary ought to have some lawyer employed in that Department to give advice to his officers.

Mr. SCOTT. That is the duty of the solicitor for the Department.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know the Secretary has a great deal of trouble in executing these new laws and if he did not have a good lawyer down there, I was going to ask the committee to arrange for one.

Mr. SCOTT. The Secretary recommends in his estimates that the salary of the solicitor now employed in the Department be increased.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was not talking about that, I was talking about the office.

Mr. SCOTT. I merely mentioned it to show the estimation in which the solicitor is held by the Secretary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much does the solicitor now get?

Mr. SCOTT. Thirty-five hundred dollars a year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the current law the salary is fixed as $3,500.

The CHAIRMAN. It is unquestionably true that a long line of decisions and precedents sustain the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York. On the other hand, if we keep in mind the words of the statute—that the Secretary is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law and such other messengers, assistant messengers, copyists and laborers, and other employees at such rate of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year—if we keep this statute in mind, it seems to the Chair that all must admit that the precedents are based upon an entirely arbitrary rule where the employee whose salary is under consideration is included in the enumerated classes. So the important question is whether these officers are included in these classes. It is plain that they are not, unless the words "other employees" is broad enough to include them.

This phrase has been interpreted by the Chair from time to time, and the precedents are all one way and to the effect that it does not include officers like these. So, while the present occupant of the Chair certainly feels that this line of precedents to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] referred is unbroken in their support of the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York, the Chair feels that if we were starting anew it might well be questioned whether the arbitrary rule might not wisely be set aside.

Mr. POLLARD. May I interrupt the Chair there to call his attention to a clause from the Digest, as found on page 359, under subdivision "(n) Change of existing law—general principles." We find in the third paragraph from the bottom of the page this language:

A department being created for the declared purpose of investigation, an appropriation for the instrumentalities of such investigation was held to be within the rules.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that from this ruling, which is founded upon a ruling of the Chair made in the Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, and inasmuch as the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture and the supplemental act that has since been passed directs the Secretary to make certain investigations, he has the authority in law to make those investigations. Now, the question is, whether the appointment of a solicitor is not considered in the sense of one of the "instrumentalities" to enable him to prosecute those investigations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of opinion that in connection therewith Congress would have authority to appropriate a lump sum, but to establish and define an office is an entirely different thing.

Mr. POLLARD. It seems to me that this case is directly in point. I do not know as I care to argue it further, but it seems to me that that precedent covers the ground fully. The Secretary certainly can not carry forward the work that is placed upon his shoulders in enforcing the pure-food law and carrying out the meat-inspection act and all the other laws without a solicitor in his Department, and it seems to me that he is certainly in the nature of one of the "instrumentalities," as covered in this decision.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would not claim, I trust, that under the pure-food law the law would authorize the appointment of a solicitor in the Department of Agriculture, because the law expressly provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall transmit these legal questions to the office of the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. POLLARD. The enforcement of the pure-food law and the meat-inspection act are among a few of the responsible duties of the Secretary of Agriculture. I simply mention that as an incident.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, here in the report made by this committee it says that the salary of the solicitor is advanced from $3,500 to $4,000. Now, that is a clear advance, and there is no law to authorize the increase of that salary. If the Department was employing a solicitor in the first instance at a salary, and the law authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint one, then he could do it, but the existing law does not authorize him to increase the salary of that solicitor whenever he sees fit to do so.

Mr. POLLARD. The trouble with the gentleman's position is that there seems to be no statutory law authorizing this position at all, unless it comes from the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture or some supplementary act amendatory thereof.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much is he paid now?

Mr. POLLARD. Three thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. MACON. No one has any objection to keeping him there at the present salary, but this report says that the solicitor is advanced from $3,500 to $4,000 without any showing on earth to the effect that the Secretary of Agriculture could not find a competent man for $3,500 to perform that service.

The CHAIRMAN. In pursuance of what the Chair has already said, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the Chair and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] make a division of this question, because it seems to me that the cabinetmaker is on a different footing. The cabinetmaker is simply a transfer from the emergency roll of the Secretary, and is transferred under the law at the same salary that he is paid at present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This transfers a man?

Mr. SCOTT. It transfers him from the employment on the emergency roll to the statutory roll, as the law requires he shall be transferred.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the point of order as to the cabinetmaker, and also as to the painter at $720 a year.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, then I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the words "five thousand," insert the following: "One solicitor, $3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want the committee's attention for a few moments and I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the committee to certain rules for the Internal-Revenue Department, that presumptively were coined by the solicitor or counselor for the Internal-Revenue Department, to show you how the tobacco growers of this country are inflicted by rules of the department enforced as law. I do this, gentlemen, with a great deal of hesitation. I do not feel at all like making a speech or argument or doing anything else, gentlemen; I should be in my room and not here, but as we are passing this agricultural bill, I came to help it along. You all know I have always taken a great deal of interest in the agricultural bills and the farmers. I invite your attention for a few moments to read you what Mr. John W. Yerkes, Internal-Revenue Commissioner——

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire what is before the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I am before the House and my motion is before the House and I hope the gentlemen will indulge me for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is addressing the committee upon his amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the gentleman any objection?

Mr. POLLARD. Unless the gentleman confines himself to the matter before the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman object to my speaking about some of the infamous rules of this Internal-Revenue Department which crush the rights and tie the hands and feet of the tobacco growers of this country? If he does, I will resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, and let the tobacco trust continue to chain and rob the people of this country. I am not talking idly. I am talking for freedom. I am for law and order, and not for tyrannies or tyrannical rules, Mr. Chairman, and I hope I may be unmolested for the few moments, particularly, for I feel physically unable to stand here in my tracks; but I would sooner die in my shoes than to stand mute and motionless, with my people crying out for justice and mercy and looking to me for succor.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman knows I fully sympathize with him in his idea. We passed the gentleman's bill the other day, unanimously, as the gentleman knows, and——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to repeal these infamous rules, and I want to show what the people have been suffering because of these departmental rules and regulations.

Mr. MANN. But we passed the gentleman's bill unanimously the other day, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And with all my beating heart I thank the gentleman and this House, as I have done before in this matter. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will indulge me, I want to read the words of these brutal and uncivilized rules. Mr. Yerkes had nothing to do with the making of these rules so far as I know. I do not know who on God's earth did make them, but of course they are charged up to the Department, and to show you I do not feel partisan about the matter, I will say the tobacco tax was put upon leaf tobacco by the Wilson tariff act and it has been perpetuated by the Dingley Act, and the Members of this House, looking to the great body of the people, feeling sympathetic for the suffering tobacco growers throughout the country, have been good enough and just enough, without a murmur, to thrice pass through this House a bill to repeal this tax law, and it has twice gone into its grave, prearranged at the other end of the Capitol, by and through the influence of tobacco trust lobbyists.

The enemies of this bill, let me state, have increased this year their lobby fund, and publicly say so in a resolution which I have at my office, and for the purpose of defeating this bill. They thanked their lobbyist for having previously defeated it. This year they increased their appropriation to meet any "extraordinary" expense they might incur in defeating this bill. But I did not take the floor, Mr. Chairman, to talk about that now. My desire is to talk about these godless rules, and them only, which I will now proceed to do. Let me state, first, that Mr. Yerkes, then Commissioner, took my bill and the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and from them drew this bill with great care, and at the request of the chairman of the subcommittee of the House, that he might beyond question protect the Government against all frauds and repeal this tax, and Mr. Yerkes assured us it would do its work well. I would not agree to the bill until he officially informed me that it would repeal or abrogate one of these miserable rules that forces the grower, when he sells his leaf tobacco to consumers or to storekeepers for consumers, to sell and deliver, do both, in person, which ties the growers hand and foot, while this tax prevents the storekeeper from selling to consumers, unless he pays the tax. Strange to say, the grower can sell and deliver, or either, by agents, if he sells to dealers, manufacturers, and exporters. Now, then, let me read these rules.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., April 7, 1902.

SIR: In your letter dated 2d instant you present several questions concerning the sale of leaf tobacco by and for farmers who raise the tobacco, or who receive the same from tenants or who buy the same while it is growing in the fields, and also whether a number of farmers may employ an agent to travel from place to place and sell the tobacco for them.

GROWER CAN NOT DELEGATE AUTHORITY TO SELL FOR HIM.

In reply you are informed that a farmer or grower of tobacco may sell tobacco of his own growth or raising, or that which he receives from his tenants as rent for land, without restriction as to the quantity sold or the business of the person to whom the tobacco is sold and delivered. This privilege is one which the farmer or grower can not delegate to another person.

The office has decided that where a grower of tobacco sells his crop before it is severed from the land to another person, the purchaser would not be privileged to resell the tobacco to consumers without payment of the tax.

A farmer or grower of tobacco may place his tobacco in the hands of a qualified dealer in leaf tobacco to be sold by him on commission, and such dealer must sell the tobacco only to other qualified leaf dealers or to qualified manufacturers of tobacco or cigars, or to persons who buy leaf tobacco in packages for export.

Any arrangement made by a farmer, or a number of farmers, with another person to sell and deliver his or their tobacco for him or them while traveling from place to place would be in violation of law. An agent who is paid a stipulated salary may travel and solicit orders for the sale of tobacco raised by another person, but he may not deliver the tobacco to purchasers; nor can he sell tobacco on commission, or receive as compensation for his services the difference between the price as fixed by the farmer and the selling price.

All tobacco sold by an agent for the farmer who raised the tobacco must be delivered by the farmer, and not the agent, directly to the person who purchased the tobacco; and a farmer must sell his tobacco in the condition in which it was cured on the farm, and can not stem, twist, plait, roll, sweeten, or otherwise manipulate it for sale to consumers.

Respectfully, J. W. YERKES, Commissioner.

We want the farmer to be allowed to employ an agent to take his tobacco in a wagon and go around over the country and sell it; we want the law so that he can put his boy in a wagon and say: "Son, take this leaf tobacco over yonder to Mr. Jones's store and sell it to him and bring me back some coffee and buy yourself some shoes." He can not do that now, gentlemen. He can not put that boy in the carryall and say: "Take this tobacco and exchange it at the store for something to eat or wear." I know it is shocking to my venerable friend from Ohio in this year of our Lord 1908, in this, a Republic, that there is such an infamous rule as that enforced as law, so that I can not put my little son in a wagon to take my leaf tobacco to the crossroads store and exchange it with the postmaster for food and raiment. I must in person sell and deliver to him. Because of this tax that caused this rule to be made the grower can not do that. Think of this restraint of freedom. If both of my arms were paralyzed and my limbs were motionless, my wife, if I had one, could not get into a wagon and take my leaf tobacco to the store and exchange it for some medicine to try to bring me back to health and strength.

Think of such a rule as that being enforced as law in this land of liberty and justice! But I can put my negro boy, I can put my son, I can put my agent in my wagon and send my corn, or wheat, or rye, or oats, or other farm products, except tobacco, to the country store and exchange them for something to eat and clothes to wear. But not so with leaf tobacco, because of this tax and this tyrannical rule, that was conceived and coined in the horrible and hellish brain of the tobacco trust and for its benefit. In short, the tobacco grower must sell and deliver, if he sells or delivers, to consumers. The storekeeper will not buy the leaf because he can not sell it untaxed to consumers, and hence he is forced to buy the manufactured tobacco made by the trust and supply the people therewith. Repeal this tax and freedom will be restored as fully as we have it with corn and wheat. Then the grower can employ all the agents he wants to sell to dealers, manufacturers, and exporters, and the grower can employ all the agents he pleases to deliver it to all or any of them, but not so when he sells to consumers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask, Mr. Chairman, for five minutes more. I will give it back to you some time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, go with me just a minute with the gray matter in your gray heads. I can put my boy in the carryall, or my wife or my servant, and say, "Take it over yonder and sell it to the dealer, or sell it to the manufacturer, or sell it to the exporter." But, who are these three? They are the tobacco trust or are dominated by the tobacco trust. A man can not be independent in manufacturing or buying and selling tobacco, however honest, patriotic, independent he in mind and heart means to be, because he is so insignificant financially in comparison with this great "monster of so frightful mien, as to be hated needs but to be seen."

Why, in morals, Mr. Chairman, can I not place my little boy or my agent in the carryall and by them send and sell my leaf tobacco to the country store, or to the town store in Nashville, or elsewhere? It is because of this rule, they say, made to "enforce this tax." The tax produces no revenue and never did—not a cent. It was imposed to kill off retailers, and has done so, and shackled the grower. Mr. Fort, at the House hearings, said that he had sold his tobacco for 5 cents, and if he could have sent it down to Mississippi where his brother was working he could have sold it for 15 cents a pound, but because this rule says that the grower must sell in person and must deliver in person if he sells or delivers to the consumer, Fort had to stay at home, as farmers must do, and sell his tobacco for 5 cents a pound to the trust, with his brother down in Mississippi ready and able to sell it, if they would have let him do it, at 15 cents a pound. Think, fellow-citizens, of living in such a state of tyranny and bureaucracy, such a shackling of the farmer's freedom!

The farmer can not leave his house, his wife, and his children to sell or deliver or to go peddling his tobacco around over the country. Yet this rule says that he can not sell it at all if he sells it to the consumer unless he goes in person and unless he delivers it in person. Both. Now, I have not, I believe, said anything on this question for a long time. Others more able than I, my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], and Mr. Trimble and Mr. Hopkins, who are now out of Congress, and a few others have ably explained it. I first spoke on the subject in 1902 in this House, and labored ceaselessly since then to pass this bill, destroy this rule, and overcome this trust, but at all times within the limits of the law and in the open.

As you were talking about employing a solicitor for the Agricultural Department, it brought to mind this infamous rule and regulation that is enforced as law, mind you. We have the word of the district attorney at Nashville, and who says, "Do not disobey this rule," and so says the Department, "If you do, we will have to arrest you and possibly confiscate your tobacco," or words to that effect, wrote Commissioner N. B. Scott.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know if the gentleman can tell the House whether they have not those so-called "Night Riders" in Tennessee?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is a "day rider" that I am talking about.

Mr. MADDEN. I wondered what the "Night Riders" are.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If this Congress long ago had not yielded to the dictation of this monopoly we would have had no "Night Riders." If the courts had done their duty we would have neither the trust nor "Night Riders."

Mr. MADDEN. I am sincere in my inquiry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know the gentleman is sincere through and through.

Mr. MADDEN. I wanted to know what the "Night Rider" consists of, what he does, and the facts about it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have never seen and do not know any "Night Riders." We had no "Night Riders" until we have had these "day-riders," representing this tobacco octopus that had this infamous rule that I am talking about made by the Department. I do not want to go into the merits of that discussion now. I want to discuss these rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be allowed to correct the totals in the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be allowed to correct the totals in the first paragraph. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg the kind indulgence of the committee for about three minutes more. It is a very serious matter, you see.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will ask unanimous consent to place that letter of Mr. Yerkes and other data in the RECORD, because I get so many letters, gentlemen, upon this subject that I can not answer all of them; and if it is put in the RECORD, it will help me answer a thousand and more letters that come to me on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The letter is as follows:

Leaf tobacco—Grower can only retail from place to place.

[Published for the information of collectors.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., November 16, 1897.

P. B. HUNT, Esq.,
Collector Fourth District, Dallas, Tex.

SIR: Mr. G. D. Powell, of Rosalie, Tex., has written to this office in regard to the sale of leaf tobacco which he raises on his farm, and states that he wishes to "put a man on the road" with a wagon to retail. He has been referred to you.

In reply you are informed that the only person who can travel from place to place retailing leaf tobacco, without liability under the internal-revenue laws, is the grower of the tobacco himself. He can not extend this privilege to other persons employed by him to act as agents for him in the sale of his leaf tobacco.

There is no objection under the internal-revenue laws and regulations to the farmer employing men either to travel and take orders by means of samples for leaf tobacco of his own growing, or to take such orders at fixed places of business, provided all these orders are sent to the farmer who ships the leaf tobacco for delivery to the persons ordering.

The law contemplates that the farmer or planter may himself sell leaf tobacco of his own growth and raising without any restrictions. He can sell it loose in the hand in any quantity and to any person, but this is a personal privilege which he can not delegate to anyone else. Leaf tobacco can not be sold for the farmer by a broker on commission or by an agent or employee without rendering such party liable as a dealer in leaf tobacco.

Respectfully, yours,

G. W. WILSON,
Acting Commissioner.

I will now read as a part of Mr. Fort's remarks from the hearings on the relief of tobacco growers before the Committee on Ways and Means (pages 36 and 37):

Mr. Fort, a tobacco grower in Robertson County, Tenn., said:

My brother and I own our farm in partnership, and he was down in Mississippi several years ago working on a levee contract, and I was staying on the farm, and I sent some tobacco down there to him, and if this tax had been removed from this tobacco we could have sold our entire crop for 15 to 20 cents a pound, and as it was we sold it for 5 cents.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you tell us, before you stop, your idea as to how this Gaines bill is going to relieve this difficulty which you complain of.

Mr. FORT. That is a conjecture. I want to be honest and sincere with this committee. I try to be honest. I believe that if this tax is taken off it will open up competition and we can sell our tobacco all over the Southern States, and that will cost these manufacturers and other men about 2 or 3 or maybe 5 cents a pound better for the tobacco, and we can stay at home and get a price for it on which we can live.

The CHAIRMAN. Why can you not sell it all through the Southern States now?

Mr. FORT. I am glad that you asked that question. I have a friend there who has three years' crop of tobacco now on hand, and unless he goes along with that tobacco he can not sell it, and as the law is now he can not sell it. But if this tax is taken off he can send his tobacco——

My good friend from Illinois has asked me about the Night Riders—who they are. I am honest in my statement—I do not know. I have never seen any nor heard any man confess he was a Night Rider. I have tried every way in my power to prevent "night riding" and "plant-bed scraping," and shall continue as a law-abiding citizen to do so. I deeply deplore these evils, brought about, I may say, by the lawless operations of this tobacco combination. This monopoly was the starting cause of all these troubles. It caused the enactment of this tax law; it gobbled up about all the big competitive tobacco companies and made them operate as one; it forced down the price of tobacco, that cost 6 cents to raise it, and robbed the growers of it at 3 to 6 cents, and have done so for years, and thereby forced the farmers to "pool" their tobacco and form two tobacco associations to sell that pooled tobacco. These associations have forced up the price of tobacco to a living price, and this same octopus is trying to undermine these associations, enticing, as it does, its members to secede by giving them, say, 13 cents for their tobacco when the pool price is 10 to 11. It gives a higher price to nonassociation growers than to association members, and in these ways and in others equally inconsiderate this combine has been trying, and is now trying, to crush these associations, and at the same time defying, I may say, the laws of the State and nation that prohibit monopoly. Not only this, but it is defying the courts, State and national; corrupts legislators, and lobbys about Congress to defeat this very just request for relief to these growers.

We had no trouble or Night Riders before this tax and trust came about and the farmer got good prices for his tobacco. I do not know who the Night Riders are, but I do know that the records of the courts and of Congress show that the tobacco trust has had men to come here and testify before the Senate committee and say that they were not connected with the tobacco trust and opposed the repeal of this tax law, and yet in this tobacco-trust case now pending in the Federal courts in New York, the proceedings which I started myself in Tennessee several years ago, and recently officers and members of this trust testifying in that case stated that some of these witnesses who had said they were not connected with the trust were members of or connected with the tobacco trust. The tobacco trust, in other words, permitted these witnesses to come here and misstate the facts and mislead this great Congress. They are what I call "day riders."

These witnesses did not come before the House committee and testify; they dare not do that. They knew and well knew that there were some Members of this House struggling to have this tobacco-tax bill made law, who had bored into their nefarious practices and had seen the foulness of their purposes and were charging even before this lawsuit, and were ready to charge, that some of these witnesses were connected with the tobacco trust. These witnesses came here in the guise of "Independents," when they were controlled body and breeches by the tobacco trust.

We have been trying since 1902 to get this tax law repealed. But these witnesses went over to the Senate and with their lobbyists defeated this bill, and I may say that Everybody's Magazine for last November prints an article by Mr. Russell, which states that two or three Senators—calling one by name—were directly interested in this tobacco trust a few years ago, since 1898. as I remember; that they were large owners of stock or bonds in this concern, and I may state that the newspapers of this city published parts of the inventory of one of the deceased Senators, which showed that that Senator owned a large block of stock or bonds in this trust, and yet this now dead Senator and the other Senator who Russell named sat on the Senate committee that considered and failed to report for two Congresses this tobacco bill that the House has three times passed without a dissenting vote against it. What do you think of that conduct, gentlemen? I am against such practices. I am against this tobacco tax. I am against these tyrannical rules. I am against the tobacco trust and condemn its methods. I am against night riding.

I am against all these evils. I am for the law vigorously executed. I am for the Constitution and faithful obedience to its mandates, and I am for and stand for and speak here to-day for the farmer whose rights have been ground in the dust by these evil influences and wrongdoers. I stand for the people against corruption, greed, and graft, and care more, sirs, for the happiness, the welfare, and the life of my people than I do for my own happiness, my own welfare, yea, for my own life, which is theirs to command in the protection of their homes. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the committee for its applause and for everything else that you have done for me and my people.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the proposition upon which the gentleman from Tennessee spoke I introduce the following amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 3, at the end of line 19: "That the term 'dealing in futures' as used in this act shall include all transactions which in any wise depend upon margins as a basis of settlement or which do not in good faith contemplate the actual delivery by the seller to the buyer of the thing or things represented or contracted to be sold, and the failure of the seller to make actual delivery to the buyer of, or the failure of the buyer to in good faith make legal demand of the seller for, the thing or things represented or contracted to be sold, shall be sufficient proof to establish the character of the transaction.

"That it shall be unlawful for any telegraph or telephone company, corporation, organization, or association, or any other company, corporation, organization, or association, or any person or persons within the jurisdiction of the United States of America to receive, deliver, transmit, or convey any interstate or foreign message or other information of any character or description to be used in any manner connected with or in furtherance of any project or transaction concerning or pertaining to the interstate or foreign buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities of any quantity or description. Any telegraph, or telephone company, corporation, organization, or association, or any other company, corporation, organization, or association violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor for each and every violation of the same, and, upon conviction, shall pay to the United States a penalty of not less than $5,000 for each offense, and any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a felony for each and every violation thereof, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 and imprisonment in the penitentiary for some period of time not less than one year.

"That interstate or foreign buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities of any kind whatsoever is hereby declared to be unlawful. Whoever shall so engage in buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities in the United States of America shall be guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction, shall be fined in any sum not less than $1,000 and imprisoned in the penitentiary for some period of time not less than one year.

"That no letter, postal card, circular, newspaper, pamphlet, or writing or publication of any other kind containing money or any other representative of value or information of any character to be used in any manner connected with or in furtherance of any project or transaction concerning or pertaining to the interstate or foreign buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities shall be carried in the mail or delivered at or through any post-office or branch thereof or by any letter carrier or other postal agent or authority. Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited or who shall knowingly send or cause to be sent anything to be conveyed or delivered in violation of this section, or who shall knowingly deliver or cause to be delivered by mail anything herein forbidden to be carried by mail shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and by imprisonment for not less than six months."

During the reading of the amendment,

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think the reading has proceeded far enough to make it clear that the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. MACON. I hope the gentleman will not technically press that objection right now. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. I will permit the amendment to be read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] to reserve the point of order.

Mr. MACON. I only desire to consume the time of the House for a minute or two. This is an agricultural bill, and it seeks to deal with agricultural interests. This amendment is certainly of the highest agricultural importance. It seeks to prevent the selling of millions of bales of cotton each year by the gamblers and speculators of the country in competition with the honest sweat and toil of the American people who produce the cotton. It seeks to prevent the selling of billions of bushels of wheat and corn and pounds of meat by the gambling speculators of this country in competition with the honest sweat and toil of those who produce those products. The supposed products that these gamblers sell are all fictitious. They are offered in competition with the honest stuff, and as a result of their nefarious procedure and practice they tie up all the money of this country in these speculative deals, so that when the time comes to sell the real article there is not money enough to buy it. And as I understand it the practice of dealing in futures in agricultural products is greatly to the detriment of the toiling masses of the country—the farmers, to whom we owe our chief homage, to whom we owe our very existence upon the face of the earth at this hour. For that reason, this being an agricultural measure, and this amendment being in the interests of the agricultural toilers of this country, I do not think any gentleman ought to arise in his place and offer a technical objection against it because it is claimed that it is not technically germane to the bill under consideration at this time.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty sympathy with the objects sought to be accomplished by the amendment of the gentleman, but it is so clearly in violation of the rule to offer it on this bill that I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the word "five," on page 1, line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the word "six," so that it will read:

Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $6,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out "five" where it first occurs and insert "six," so that it will read: "Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $6,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman insists upon the point of order, I do not care to be heard at great length upon the subject. During this entire Congress we have used every opportunity to assert that we are in favor of the Agricultural Department, and in favor of the great good that is being accomplished by it. I think, whether the Congress knows it or not, the people of the United States are well aware that this branch of the Government is one of the greatest if not the greatest branch thereof. Since the present Secretary of Agriculture became the head of this Department it has risen from a mere office to a magnitude that is simply wonderful. We hear it said every day that the services of superior officials are demanded in consequenece of the growth of this Department; that the meat-inspection bill has forced upon it great and multitudinous labors, and that the pure-food law has done likewise. Now, in consequence of this, I assert that the present Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, in whom I have the greatest confidence, is doing a remarkable work. He is a man eminently qualified. He is a scientist of the highest order, and my opinion is that he does more work and greater work for the people of the United States than any assistant in any Department of the Government. The Assistant Secretary of the Interior is receiving $6,000, and I believe that the present Assistant Secretary of Agriculture is at least entitled to equal if not a greater salary than the Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was an attempt made earlier in this session to increase the compensation of all the first assistant secretaries in the Departments. That effort failed. It may be possible that they may all have their compensation increased before this session adjourns; but I do not think we should discriminate in favor of this assistant secretary at this time.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I was impelled to offer this amendment at this time in the belief that there would not be objection raised, or at least no point of order made.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the gentleman knows that all the other proposed increases went out on a point of order.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I understand that very well, but the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] was the gentleman who raised the point of order when that question was before the House, and I was pleased to hear him rise a moment ago and eulogize this Department and attempt to improve it if possible by the amendment that he sought to place upon it. Therefore I was emboldened to offer this amendment upon the theory that as he would not object and raise a point of order, no other gentleman upon the floor would do so. I am a little surprised that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] should do it, because I believe he is in favor of raising all the other salaries that were sought to be raised in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, and I thought that since the gentleman from Arkansas did not make the point of order now, owing to his love for this Department, no other gentleman would raise the point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, It is somewhat a surprise to myself, but as long as the surprise is so agreeable I shall continue to enjoy it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WEATHER BUREAU.

Salaries, office of Chief of Weather Bureau: One Chief of Bureau, $5,000; one assistant chief of Bureau, $3,000; one chief clerk, $2,250; four chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; one librarian, $2,000; six clerks of class 4; seven clerks of class 3; eighteen clerks of class 2; twenty-seven clerks of class 1; eighteen clerks, at $1,000 each; nine clerks, at $900 each; four copyists or typewriters, at $840 each; one copyist or typewriter, $720; two assistant foremen of division, at $1,600 each; one proof reader, $1,400; one chief mechanic, $1,400; one lithographer, $1,300; three lithographers, at $1,200 each; two pressmen, at $1,250 each; ten compositors, at $1,250 each; one skilled mechanic, $1,200; six skilled mechanics, at $1,000 each; one engineer, $1,200; one captain of the watch, $1,000; one electrician, $1,000; six skilled artisans, at $840 each; five messengers or laborers, at $720 each; three firemen, at $720 each; four watchmen, at $720 each; five folders and feeders, at $720 each; three folders and feeders, at $630 each; six messengers or laborers, at $660 each; thirteen messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; four messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; five messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $450 each; one charwoman, $360; three charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $202,510.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman a question. I notice, on page 4, line 1, the number of clerks has been increased from six to seven; on the same page, line 2, from twenty-six to twenty-seven in one instance, and seventeen to eighteen in another; in line 14 the number of clerks has been increased from five to six; the number of watchmen, in line 21, from three to four. Now, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this is the result of increased necessity for additional help in the Department, or is it just because it was recommended by the head of the Department?

Mr. SCOTT. In the first place, the committee has found the recommendations of the Chief of the Weather Bureau to be conservative, and has always attached a great deal of weight to those recommendations. As evidence that they are conservative I am glad to call the attention of the House to the fact that there are about twenty less employees in the Weather Bureau Office in Washington to-day than there were thirteen years ago, when the present chief took charge.

The recommendations in question were allowed on account of the increased demand for the service. Professor Moore, in the hearings before the committee, said:

Every community wants more and more service, and the communication to us of meteorological data is all the time on the increase, so that our business, as I say, is gradually growing, and I anticipate possibly the committee may make some increase in the number of stations and buildings, and if so it is still more necessary that we should have some increase in the clerical force in Washington.

Mr. MADDEN. And is this largely in anticipation of the number of new stations that will be established?

Mr. SCOTT. It is partly in anticipation of an increased number of stations.

Mr. MADDEN. I submit that the naming of additional men in these Departments ought not to be in advance of the needs of the Department. From the statement made by the chairman of the committee, I take it that they anticipate to give additional service at some time in the distant future, but that at present there is no need of these additional men. I make the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. MADDEN. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 22, after the word "Bureau," strike out the word "five" and insert the word "six."

Mr. FITZGERALD. To that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order to that amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to increase the salary of the very efficient Chief of the Weather Bureau. In the Government service we have what might be termed four great scientific Bureaus—the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Census Bureau, the Geological Survey, and the Weather Bureau. The chiefs of these four Bureaus are the only chiefs of bureaus which, under the law, the President is authorized to appoint and which the Senate confirms.

The Chief of the Geodetic Survey—an eminent scientist, whose Bureau is under the Treasury Department—receives, under the law, a salary of $6,000 a year. The Chief of the Census Bureau—a very able man, whose Bureau is under the Department of Commerce and Labor—is paid a salary of $6,000 a year. And, under the provisions of the bill recently presented by the chairman of the Census Committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], it is stipulated that during the census period, covering three years, the Chief of that Bureau shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year. The Chief of the Geological Survey—a distinguished scientist, whose Bureau is connected with the Interior Department—is paid a salary of $6,000 a year; and the Chief of the Weather Bureau, whose Bureau is connected with the great Agricultural Department—being the remaining scientist of this class—is paid only a salary of $5,000.

Now, I submit to the gentleman who interposed this point of order—I do not know whether it was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], or the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]—but, whoever it was, I submit to him in all fairness that a discrimination is now being practiced against the Chief of the Weather Bureau and the Department with which he is connected. As I have said, there are four chiefs of these scientific Bureaus, the only bureau chiefs whom the President is authorized to nominate and whom the Senate confirm. Three of them—the Chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Chief of the Geological Survey, and the Chief of the Census Bureau—now each receive $6,000 a year, and have received such salary for a number of years.

Now, I submit in all fairness, why should the remaining chief, the one connected with the Department of Agriculture, be the only chief of a bureau appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate not to receive $6,000? Why should he be discriminated against and his salary kept down to a level of $5,000?

When this service—weather forecasting—was first provided for, I believe it was under the War Department, and a United States Army officer of the rank and pay of a major of cavalry was in charge of the bureau or office furnishing the service. Subsequently the office was placed in charge of an Army officer belonging to the Signal Corps with the rank of brigadier-general, whose pay, of course, is larger than that now paid to the Chief of the Weather Bureau. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the gentlemen making this point of order, I submit in all fairness, is not a continuance of the present salary a discrimination against the Department of Agriculture and an injustice to the worthy Chief of this Bureau, and can it be considered other than a discrimination if we permit his salary to remain at $5,000? I also want to direct the attention of members of the committee, and especially of the gentlemen who make the point of order, to the fact that under the law as it is written the Chief of the Weather Bureau is the one chief of a bureau in the Agricultural Department who is authorized by law in the absence of the Secretary to act as Secretary of Agriculture. In consideration of these facts and upon its merits, upon the equity of the case, I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I feel impelled to join my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] in appealing for a withdrawal of the point of order. A few years ago, while this salary was still at the same figure that is fixed in the present law and in this bill, Congress, under the authority in the appropriation bills, provided for this officer and for various other officers of the Government an additional compensation in the way of horses and carriages. It is very true that the ordinary official of the Government, even including the assistant secretaries of the Departments, if they use a team and a carriage do it for their own convenience and not for the public service. Taking that view of it, after a contest which lasted for two years, it was finally provided that no officer of the Government should have the use of a team and carriage at public expense, with the exception of the few who were named, being the Cabinet officers and the secretary of the President. The Chief of the Weather Bureau is constantly required in his official performance of duties to make use of a team and a carriage, to keep several conveyances. He is often required under the necessities of the case in the middle of the night to be called from his home to the Weather Office. He is often required under the act of Congress authorizing him to act as Secretary of Agriculture, to go to the Agricultural Department, a long distance from the Weather Bureau, and not convenient for street-car transportation. The result has been that Professor Moore has been required at his own expense to do that which formerly the Government provided for—provide a team and a carriage for official use—and so far as I have been informed he has never done what another officer of the Government now provided with carriages and horses did do. The Public Printer—no longer the Public Printer—a year ago invited all Members of Congress, I believe, to drive in public conveyances from the Capitol to the Printing Office. Although he was provided with a team and carriage for the benefit of the public printing only, and although that invitation was a violation of that provision, the Public Printer still enjoys at public expense the use of the team and carriage which probably would cost him, if furnished by himself, at least the extra $1,000 a year. Now, in my judgment, Professor Moore, admittedly one of the greatest scientists of the country, at the head of a great scientific department, ought to be provided with at least the same amount of salary that he received three or four years ago, or before this amendment went into the legislative bill cutting off the use of his team. That is all that this amendment would amount to. He now has to pay that expense out of his own pocket, and I hope the gentleman will make an exception in this case where the merit is with the case, and withdraw the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to join in the appeal that has been made by my friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] and my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the other gentlemen and ask them to withdraw their points of order. It has been shown clearly by the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois that there is a discrimination against this particular chief in comparing him with the other bureaus. There is no doubt but what the ability of this particular officer will compare favorably with any of the others that were named by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], and there is no reason why he should not receive the same salary. But, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me there is another reason, and it is no wonder that we have not had any better weather than we have had. [Laughter.] We have been discriminating against this man who makes the weather, and for the sake of sunshine in Washington, of rain in the West, of more shade in the South, and more warmth in the North, I appeal to these gentlemen to withdraw their points of order. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if I thought that the charge of being responsible for good or bad weather would be leveled at me in insisting on the point of order, I might feel constrained to withdraw it, but though I have listened attentively to the remarks of the three gentlemen who have preceded me as to the reason the salary of this officer should be raised, I wish to call attention of the committee to the fact, in justification of insisting on the point of order, that it comes without any recommendation from the committee; and more, we find the usual arguments advanced by, I will not say friends, but acquaintances of this officer, to level the salary up to the highest paid to any official in the service acting as chief of a bureau.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at this time. That is the condition we find throughout the entire service. It has not been advanced by any of the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of this increase that the work of the Chief of the Weather Bureau is as onerous, as burdensome, and as responsible as the work of the Chief of the Census Bureau. Nothing like that has been presented, and if any such circumstances were presented they should be properly presented to and considered by the Committee on Agriculture which has this matter in charge, and not haphazardly presented here in Committee of the Whole, where we, as members, are entirely unacquainted with the merits of the case.

I have no sympathy with this movement to lift up to the highest level the salary of bureau officers, for if you consider the history of it there are some instances where the highest salary is merited, where the work is cumbersome and onerous, and there is justification for some of these chiefs of bureaus receiving $6,000 or $7,500, while the chief of a weather bureau might only be entitled to much less, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin insists upon his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

On March 26, 1908:

H. R. 17710. An act to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Life-Saving Service of the United States.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fuel, lights, and repairs, Weather Bureau: Fuel, lights, repairs, and other expenses for the care and preservation of the public buildings and grounds of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington, $10,000.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In prefacing the request which I state to this committee, that in thirteen months I have occupied just thirty minutes of the time of this House, I realize that in that thirty minutes I may possibly have encroached upon its generous attention. I shall ask that in discussing this question I have fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill opened before this House under the most auspicious circumstances. I heard the able chairman of this committee, for whom I entertain not only the most genuine regard, but the most profound respect, having served with him on more than one committee, I listened to his able elaboration of the immense importance of this measure, how it touched the whole people, and in that the chairman of the committee was absolutely correct.

Forty millions of people, Mr. Chairman, are affected by this bill. This is the farmers' bill, this is the people's bill, this is a bill in which it was presumed that the questoin of politics and the exigencies of politics could never enter. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, it was the earnest desire of those representing the rural districts that this bill should be earnestly, carefully, and elaborately considered. We had no ax to grind, we were in a hopeless minority, from many of these bills and measures we had little to expect, but we felt we could, in behalf of the farmers, ask from the majority of this House at least an earnest, a candid, and a fair discussion and consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For that reason that able, gallant Texan [Mr. HENRY] arose in this House, and he said:

Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to state that this is a most important bill, and there are a great many Members who desire to be heard in general debate, and when this important bill is taken up I see no reason why the debate should be limited to four hours on each side. It seems to me there ought to be at least three or four days of general debate; we ought to have at least eight or ten hours on each side. I will ask the gentleman if he could not agree to three days' general debate on the bill?

Mr. Chairman, that request was denied, and yet you are told that there are weather bureaus; you are told that there are agricultural colleges; you are told that there are plant industries; that there is a great Appalachian forest reserve, a domain to be redeemed and preserved for the benefit of the common country; that all of these things are crying for attention. Ah, it will not do to say, Mr. Chairman, that the time allowed for debate is not given to the discussion of this bill. I defy any Member upon that side of the House to deny this agricultural bill has been discussed more since it came before this House than any other bill during this Congress. Yea, more, it stretches out over all the other bills so that Mr. HEFLIN, a member of the Agricultural Committee, had to go into the pension bill to get that miserable modicum of time he could not secure in the discussion of this bill, and he is a member of that committee.

We see members of the committee from all over this side slipping in on every kind of a bill to get some chance to say a word for the farmer, and yet you come before us with the miserable pretense, that hollow, shallow, flimsy cant, that you are devoted to the farmer. The Republican party has made two mistakes. It has taken the negro for a chattel and the farmer for a dupe. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is an election year. There is no fat to be fried out of the farmer. He is patient, he asks no questions. In the Senate you spend weeks discussing a bill which the bankers and merchants are interested in. Why, Mr. Chairman, listen to this death roll: The urgent deficiency bill had six hours' debate, the Indian appropriation bill had ten hours' debate, the pension bill twelve and a half hours' debate, the legislative bill had ten hours' debate, the Army appropriation bill six hours, the post-office bill four hours, the penal code thirty-six hours, the President's message sixteen hours, and the agricultural appropriation bill five hours for the farmer and one hour more. The chairman of this committee rises in his place——

Mr. MADDEN. Was it not ten hours?

Mr. STANLEY. The time fixed yesterday was five hours for this bill, and they managed to steal a little before.

Mr. SCOTT. This bill was discussed before——

Mr. STANLEY. That matter was discussed for a day before the time was fixed. Put it ten, and I will not complain. Over protests, over appeals from men coming on bended knees, in the name of their horny-handed constituents, and asking for time to say a word, the chairman of this committee——

Mr. LAMB. The minority would have gotten five hours but for an objection on our side.

Mr. STANLEY. Nay, nay; I differ with the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LAMB. I know what I am talking about. [Applause.]

Mr. STANLEY. I think I do, too. Five hours were allowed by unanimous consent. Mr. SULZER objected, as he ought to have objected, as Mr. HENRY objected, and as any other man interested in the tillers of the soil should have protested—honestly, indignantly. Then look what was done. The miserable five hours that were given to us were cut down to four hours. If five hours was right, if five hours was necessary, why should Mr. SULZER's objection cut it down to four?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should not refer to the members of the committee by their names.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman from New York. I am not criticising Mr. SULZER. I presume he will not object.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman now yield to an interruption?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask if the gentleman from Kentucky himself did not consume thirty minutes of the four hours devoted to the farmer in the discussion of Alexander Hamilton?

Mr. STANLEY. I did. I want to say that the farmer has nothing more to fear anywhere, any time, from any source, than from this disposition to take the fruit of his toil and spend it on an imperialistic conquest of the seas. Yea, more. Five years I have been in this House, and five out of six hours, five out of six minutes, and five out of six seconds that you have heard me I have been discussing the interests of the farmer. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] say the same thing?

Mr. OLMSTED. I am always discussing his interests.

Mr. STANLEY. Collaterally. Mr. Chairman, let them go before the people and say, when the farmer protests that he was not heard, that you cut down the debate from five hours to four because Mr. SULZER acted ugly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair again calls the attention of the gentleman——

Mr. STANLEY. I beg pardon. Because the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] acted unbecomingly. Will it do to say to the people that you deprived them of the hour in the discussion of this bill, not that you love them less, but that you hated SULZER more?

Mr. Chairman, I am a member of that agricultural committee. On bended knee, humbly, courteously, I hope, and persistently, I know, I have pleaded that this debate might be continued but thirty minutes longer, pleaded for weeks that members of this committee, at least, might be allowed one hour apiece, if that was desired in discussing the bill, and that request, with a total indifference to the welfare of the farmer, was absolutely denied. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, the farmers are not asleep; that they know their interests are forgotten and abandoned. They are awake, and to the head of this party, in the language of the great cardinal, I declare, "Walk blindfold on; behind thee stalks the headsman."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I realize, of course, that Members of this House will not misunderstand the situation that has existed here for the last three days, but I do feel as if, in view of what has been said by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], a statement should be put into the RECORD at this time as to the division of the time and the purpose for which the time was used in this debate. There have been ten hours of general debate on this bill, of which six hours, substantially, were consumed by Members on the Democratic side. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] this morning was given a full hour, which he used in discussing matters entirely outside of the bill, by unanimous consent granted on this side of the Chamber, notwithstanding the fact that similar requests from this side have been uniformly denied from the other side for the past week. The RECORD will show also that at least two hours out of the six occupied by the minority in debate upon this bill were occupied by gentlemen who were not members of the Committee on Agriculture and who discussed topics not germane to the measure. It is true that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], a member of the committee, took his time under another bill to debate matters connected, perhaps, with this one. I understand, however, he did that because he desired to leave the city at a time when he thought this bill would be under discussion, and took the time that was offered him, fearing that he might not be in Washington when this bill was under consideration.

I am sure the House recognizes that ample time has been given for all the debate desired upon this bill, and that the minority have been more than fairly treated in the distribution of that time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, Weather Bureau: Stationery and blank books; furniture and repairs to same; freight and express charges; subsistence, care, and purchase of horses and vehicles for official purposes only; repairs of harness; advertising, dry goods, twine, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, washing towels, and other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for in the city of Washington, $11,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what extraordinary occasion arises to call for an expenditure of the additional thousand dollars in these contingent expenses.

Mr. SCOTT. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I will state that for a good many years the amount for contingent expenses has stood at $10,000. As we all know, there has been a marked advance in the cost of supplies that are paid for under this paragraph during recent years, and the Chief of the Bureau told us that he had not been able to buy what he wanted for the last two or three years; that he had used many articles longer than he would have used them if he had had a more liberal contingent fund, and he asked for an increase now only because the situation had become such that the Bureau could not longer get along with the amount that it had. He asked for an increase of $2,000; the committee allowed $1,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, station employees, Weather Bureau: Professors of meteorology, inspectors, district forecasters, local forecasters, section directors, research observers, observers, assistant observers, operators, skilled mechanics, repair men, station agents, messengers, messenger boys, laborers, and other necessary employees, for duty in the District of Columbia or elsewhere in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda, $586,750.

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve the point of order against the words "skilled mechanics," in line 23, page 5.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman intends to insist upon the point of order regardless of the merits of the subject, I do not care to take any time in discussing it.

Mr. MADDEN. I wanted to hear what the gentleman had to say concerning these words.

Mr. SCOTT. That language was inserted merely because it had not been included in the bill heretofore, and yet the Bureau, of course, needs and has always had the assistance of skilled mechanics. The Chief of the Bureau was of the opinion that such language ought to be introduced in the bill simply to obviate any possible question with the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. What kind of skilled mechanics are they?

Mr. SCOTT. They are instrument makers, carpenters, painters, cabinetmakers, skilled mechanics of various sorts, that are employed by the Bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. Have they been there all the time?

Mr. SCOTT. They have been there all the time.

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Weather Bureau: Every expenditure requisite for and incident to the equipment and maintenance of meteorological observation stations in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda, including the purchase of stationery, furniture, instruments, storm-warning towers, and all other necessary supplies and materials; for repair and improvement of Weather Bureau buildings now completed and located outside of the District of Columbia, and care and preservation of grounds, including not to exceed $15,000 for the completion of the physical laboratory building and the office and cottage building at Mount Weather, Virginia; for the erection of a main observatory building at Mount Weather, Virginia, to replace the observatory building destroyed by fire October 23, 1907, and for the erection of a central heating and power station thereat, not to exceed $60,000; for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a building at each of the following-named places, for use of the Weather Bureau, and for all necessary labor, materials, and expenses, plans and specifications to be prepared and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the work done under the supervision of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, namely: Abilene, Tex.; Dodge City, Kans.; Richmond, Va.; East Lansing, Mich.; Northfield, Vt.; St. Joseph, Mo., and Fort Wayne, Ind., not to exceed $105,000. For the reestablishment of the Weather Bureau station at Pikes Peak, Colo., not to exceed $5,000; for rents of offices; for official traveling expenses; for freight and express charges; for telegraphing, telephoning, or cabling reports and messages, rates to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture by agreement with the companies performing the service; for maintenance and repair of Weather Bureau telegraph, telephone, and cable lines; for investigation on climatology; for river rain, snow, ice, crop, evaporation, and aerial observations and reports; for storm, hurricane, and other observations, warnings, and reports; including pay of special observers and display men, none of whom shall receive more than $25 per month; and including not to exceed $18,000 for the maintenance of a printing office in the city of Washington, including the purchase of necessary supplies and materials for printing weather maps, bulletins, circulars, forms, monthly reviews, and other publications, and for pay of assistant foremen, proof readers, compositors, pressmen, lithographers, and folders and feeders, when necessary; in all, $852,000.

Total for Weather Bureau, $1,662,260.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to reserve the point of order to the paragraph for the purpose of obtaining some information.

Mr. PERKINS. My object is very much the same. I would like to reserve the point of order to this portion of the paragraph, beginning on line 14, page 6, after "not to exceed," down to and including "Fort Wayne, Ind.;" and further down, on page 7, line 19, beginning with the word "and," down to and including "the city of Washington," in line 21.

As to these I reserve the point of order, because I am not sure whether I desire to make it until after the chairman has furnished such explanation as he may.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of these points of order I would like a division made and have them passed upon one at a time. Some of them stand upon a different footing than others. In regard to the portion of the paragraph to which the gentleman from New York has first called attention, I wish to state that for several years past the Weather Bureau has been constructing a research station at Mount Weather, Virginia, upon the Blue Ridge, 60 miles southwest of Washington. The purpose of that station is to conduct new and original meteorological investigations with a view to broadening the science upon which the whole service of the Weather Bureau rests. Your committee, as I remarked in my opening statement, is very strongly of the opinion that as long as we are spending a million and a half dollars annually to make and distribute weather forecasts we could very economically expend a few thousand dollars each year in the hope of gaining additional information which would make those forecasts more accurate, and therefore more valuable. Now, this research station consists of several buildings. The administration building was burned last October. It was the building in which the observers and the employees of that station lived. The station itself is some 5 or 6 miles from even a small village, and it is necessary for the employees working in it to live at the station. Since the administration building was burned they have been practically camping out, living in the barn and in a farmhouse near by, a situation which obviously can not continue indefinitely.

The provision for this item was handed down as a supplemental estimate in the regular way by the Secretary, and your committee believed that it ought to be allowed to remain in the bill.

As to the other station buildings provided for in this paragraph, nothing can be said except that it is the policy of the Bureau, as rapidly as the buildings can be economically constructed, to house its observers in its own buildings. It is found to be economy to do this, in a great many ways—economy in money and economy in time and results.

It is true that the estimates as they came from the Department did not contain these items relating to the construction of new Weather Bureau buildings. The estimates did not contain them, for the reason that a similar appropriation was stricken out on a point of order when this bill was before the House last year, and, that being the case, the Secretary thought the Congress ought to initiate the appropriation if it was to be continued.

During the past several years nearly every agricultural appropriation bill has contained an item similar to this. Only on two occasions within my own service in the House has a point of order been made against them, when they have been stricken out in pursuance thereof. The House, as a rule, has agreed with the committee in forwarding the policy of the Bureau.

Mr. STAFFORD. Right there, if the gentleman will permit a question.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has it been the policy of the committee to designate the places where these Weather Bureau stations should be established, or have they left it to the discretion of the Department to establish them?

Mr. SCOTT. The practice has differed in that respect. In some bills the places were designated by the committee. In other bills the places were not designated, and a lump sum simply was provided, the location of the stations being left to the discretion of the Chief of the Bureau, of course with the advice of the Secretary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee who selected these various places and how they came to be designated?

Mr. SCOTT. At the time the subcommittee was preparing this bill, when it reached the conclusion that it should include an appropriation for certain buildings, the Chief of the Weather Bureau was out of the city. By direction of the subcommittee, I wired him, asking his recommendation as to the places where buildings should be located, and it was in response to his telegram, supplemented by an oral statement a few days later, when he returned to Washington and came before the entire committee, that the places named in the bill were designated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state whether he prefers the designation of the places or whether he advocates the appropriation of a lump sum, with discretion in the Chief of the Bureau to locate the various stations as he deems best for the service?

Mr. SCOTT. I take it that any committee would be governed very largely by the recommendations of the Chief of this Bureau in a matter of that kind. I do believe, however, that the committee ought to hold the matter in its own hands, so as to approve or reject any recommendation that the Chief may make.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has not answered the question. Perhaps he did not gather it as stated. I wish to have the chairman advise us whether the Chief of the Weather Bureau recommends a lump-sum appropriation, leaving to him the designation of the sites, or whether he recommends that the committee shall designate the places where the buildings shall be erected?

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman mean the general policies?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether he recommends lump-sum appropriations, or whether he recommends that they shall be designated in the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. The Chief of the Weather Bureau has never signified his preference before the committee in that matter in any way whatever. He has always held himself subject to the wishes of the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. How often, to the gentleman's knowledge, has it been the practice, when such an item has been carried for structures for the Weather Bureau, that the places have been designated, and how often has there been a lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. I have been a member of this committee for three Congresses, and this is the fourth; and in these four Congresses, to the best of my recollection, the places for the stations have been designated in three of the bills, two besides this, and a lump sum in the remaining bills.

Mr. STAFFORD. Designated upon the request of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, or by action of the committee irrespective of the recommendation of the Chief of the Bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. Designated by the committee after consultation with the Chief of the Bureau.

Mr. STAFFORD. And after request by the Chief of the Bureau to have certain places designated?

Mr. SCOTT. No, that has not always been the case. The committee, as in this case, has called upon the Chief of the Weather Bureau to give the committee his best judgment as to where the buildings should be located.

Mr. STAFFORD. So as to be informed as to the total amount of the appropriation that might be needed for the character of the service, whether it designated the places or not.

Mr. SCOTT. No, the committee has determined in the first place how much money it thought ought to be appropriated, and then called in the Chief and asked his advice as to where the buildings should be erected.

Mr. STAFFORD. In these instances where Congress has appropriated a lump sum, has there been any instances where the discretion vested in the Chief of the Weather Bureau has been abused in selecting the sites?

Mr. SCOTT. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no special reason why the places should be designated? The appropriation of a lump sum leaves it to the Chief of the Weather Bureau to select the places that he deems for the best of the service.

Mr. SCOTT. Unless this might be a reason. Members of the House will recall that in the last Congress, when the Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture was investigating the expenditures of that Department, some question arose as to the source of the money expended at Mount Weather, and it appeared from the testimony before the committee that the buildings there had been constructed under the authority carried in several appropriation bills for the erection of weather station buildings. Some members of the Committee on Agriculture did not understand, or had not understood, that part of the money appropriated for these buildings for the construction of Weather Bureau stations was to be used at Mount Weather. There was a misunderstanding, and that was in the minds of the members of the committee this year when they decided that it would be best to designate the places where it was thought that these buildings should be constructed.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that was the only objection, I should like to put this query, whether the gentleman thinks it was impossible to place a limitation in phraseology sufficiently definite so as to limit the appropriation to these weather stations and yet prevent the Chief of the Weather Bureau using it at Mount Weather, and thereby carry out the intent of the committee?

Mr. SCOTT. It would have been easily possible to include such a limitation, but the committee was very anxious that the bill should be so phrased that nobody could misinterpret its provisions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not ground for reasonable objection that if we established the policy of designating the places, taking it out of the control of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, who can only be actuated by the best motives in establishing places throughout the country, there might grow up, as has been the case in the public-building bill, a desire on the part of Members to seek to have stations established in their districts, irrespective of the needs of the Weather Bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think it can be said that the matter is taken out of the hands of the Chief of the Bureau, because I can hardly conceive that any Committee on Agriculture would make an appropriation for the erection of stations at given places except on the judgment of the Chief as to the needs of the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows, if he has inquired into the location of cities for public buildings, that there are places where public buildings have been erected for fourth-class post-offices where the receipts are less than a thousand dollars and many instances where appropriations for public buildings have been abused.

Mr. SCOTT. But the gentleman must recognize that this is a vastly different case from that which is offered by the Post-Office Department. There are post-offices at every little cross-roads, and it is possible there might be abuses such as the gentleman has suggested. The Post-Office Department is not a scientific service. But the Weather Bureau is a scientific service, and the advisability of establishing stations in the first place and of constructing buildings at those stations in the second place must always and necessarily be a matter in which the judgment of the Chief of this great scientific Bureau would receive very careful consideration.

Mr. BURLESON. And as a matter of fact he did recommend each one of these buildings.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I understand the gentleman, his last statement only confirms my position, that this matter should be left, in its expenditure, to the discretion of the Chief of the Weather Bureau rather than that the committee should designate places where these stations should be established; for, taking the words of the gentleman, he says it is a scientific service, that should be established only as the Chief should determine, and why not leave it to his full discretion rather than have the committee pass on the respective stations upon the recommendations of some Representative who might be directly concerned in the establishment of a weather station in some locality.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman misunderstood me if he understood me to say that the location of the buildings was a matter to be determined solely by the Chief of the Bureau. What I mean to say is that his advice would have great weight with any committee. But the Chief of the Bureau in his annual report has recommended that buildings be constructed at a large number of places, at a larger number of places than your committee felt warranted in making appropriations for, and we therefore called him before the committee and asked him to state the reasons that influenced him to recommend these various places. Then the committee exercised its own judgment after the reasons had been given in determining where the buildings were most needed.

Mr. STAFFORD. And then this being a scientific matter solely and the Chief of the Bureau better equipped to determine the location than the members of the committee, because of his scientific knowledge and better knowledge of the Service, if the committee did not believe it advisable to recommend all the places, what abuse of discretion could follow by cutting down the appropriation and voting him a lump-sum appropriation and leaving it to him to determine where these stations should be erected to meet the requirements of the Service.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, the only answer to that suggestion, perhaps, is that there are different men with different minds. It was the judgment of the committee that the places ought to be designated in the bill. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is of another opinion, of course he is entitled to hold it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am trying to get information as to reasons that prompted the committee in designating the places, so as to act intelligently in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I think we are proceeding under unanimous consent without any limit of time, because I have reserved a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illionis asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kansas be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that when the Committee on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department made its investigation last year, there was considerable criticism indulged in of the Chief of the Weather Bureau because a part of the lump-sum appropriation for weather stations had been, as was asserted, diverted to the weather station at Mount Weather, and that therefore the Chief of the Bureau himself desired Congress to specify places where these stations were to be erected.

Mr. SCOTT. The Chief of the Weather Bureau undoubtedly preferred that that should be done.

Mr. MANN. He wanted to divert criticism from himself.

Mr. SCOTT. Exactly. He did not want any further misunderstanding on the part of the committee or anybody else.

Mr. MANN. Exactly; and is it not a fact that Congress generally has considerable confidence in the honesty of purpose of the Chief of the Weather Bureau and would be quite willing to leave the matter to the judgment of the Weather Bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. I think that is quite likely.

Mr. MANN. Now, of course, I know—I will not take too much of the gentleman's time and I will give him some of mine if I can get the floor——

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question some time when I can interrupt this conversation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will in the time of the gentleman from Kansas, if I may.

Mr. SCOTT. I will grant the time for that purpose.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois—I think he is familiar with the subject, being on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—if that Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce takes the recommendations of the Light-House Board for the establishment of light-house stations and appropriates a lump sum, or whether they take the recommendation and make specific appropriations for these stations at different points located by them when they bring in a bill.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce brings no bill for an appropriation at all, but they bring in a bill for specific location of light-houses, and I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from New York and the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the difference between the bill reported from our committee about light-houses and this bill. There are eight stations named in this bill: One at Abilene, Tex.—Texas was represented on this committee—one at Dodge City, Kans.——

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. MANN. And Kansas was represented on this committee.

Mr. BURLESON. That recommendation for Abilene, Tex., was made before the gentleman from Texas was ever a member of that committee——

Mr. MANN. One at Richmond, Va.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman from Virginia never said a word about it to anyone.

Mr. MANN. One at East Lansing, Mich., and Michigan was represented on this committee; one at Northfield, Vt., and Vermont was represented on this committee; one at St. Joseph, Mo., Missouri being represented on this committee; one at Fort Wayne, Ind., Indiana being represented on this committee. Now, do not misunderstand me. I do not think for a moment that these stations are located in these States because those gentlemen are represented on the committee——

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman permit? I merely want to suggest to the gentleman, while Missouri is poorly represented in this instance——

Mr. MANN. Well represented.

Mr. RUCKER. In my judgment Missouri presents the most meritorious project in the whole bill. Let me say just one word further. The fact is St. Joseph, Mo., is the largest city in the United States without Weather Bureau service, and the Chief of the Bureau says that city ought to have it.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have read some descriptions of St. Joseph that would indicate that it is the largest city in the United States without that.

Mr. RUCKER. It is going to be, if it is not now.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if there are any stations for Illinois and New York in this bill, and if there are none, whether the States of Illinois and New York are not both represented on this committee?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether—yes.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman's colleague from Chicago.

Mr. MANN. They are both represented on the committee, and I hope the gentlemen will not misunderstand me. I am making no criticism of the committee bringing in the bill in this shape with these stations located in these States. I have not any doubt these places need these stations, but the gentleman knows very well that the tendency is such——

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for a second?

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman from New York asked about light-houses. There is no such thing in any light-house bill which I have had the honor to report to this body.

Mr. PAYNE. Have there not been light-houses located in the State of New York?

Mr. MANN. There has been no light-house located in the State of Illinois on any bill I have reported.

Mr. PAYNE. Have there not been light-houses located in New York?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not represent New York.

Mr. PAYNE. But New York has always had a Member or two on that committee. I think the reflection is unjust in either case either on this committee or on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not misunderstand me. If we needed a light-house in Illinois, and I was on the committee, I would not hesitate to put it in a bill because I was on the committee; I am not so foolish as that.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. In reference to the station provided at Abilene, Tex., in all fairness to the committee, I want to state that the recommendation for a building at Abilene, Tex., was made by the Chief of the Weather Bureau years before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] went on that committee, and in the report that was made before the investigation that was conducted by the Committee—of the gentleman from Maine—on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture a recommendation for a building at Abilene, Tex., headed the list, and consequently——

Mr. MANN. Of course it headed the list, for here it commences with A, B, and it is at the head of the list. [Laughter.] I do not think the gentlemen of the committee themselves favor the idea of leaving this to the head of the Weather Bureau. We all know what would happen. We are human, every one of us, and we all know what would happen.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. In the time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that these places are all put in on the recommendation of the Weather Bureau already. It certainly could not improve it any to let the Chief of the Weather Bureau put them in, because these are practically put in by the chief himself. So the chairman says—in every instance, as I understand it.

Mr. SCOTT. In every case.

Mr. MANN. The chairman of the committee——

Mr. NORRIS. It is there because the Chief of the Weather Bureau has so recommended it. Now, it will practically be the same thing if the committee were inclined to favor it themselves, and I am not saying that they have at all; but if they were inclined to favor it themselves, the Chief of the Weather Bureau can look in the Congressional Directory and find out who the members of the committee are, and it will be perfectly natural for him to favor the members of that committee, perhaps. I do not see that there would be anything gained by doing it the other way, because we are practically doing it the same way, as we are, subject to some objections, perhaps, but I do not believe we can improve upon the method any.

Mr. MANN. I do not doubt the Chief of the Weather Bureau, if given authority, would locate these eight stations at these places, but it is a pretty bad precedent, after all.

Mr. HASKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. MANN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HASKINS. The station at Northfield, Vt., is an old one. It has existed a great many years. It is located upon the ground of the Norwich University, the military college in Vermont. It has been heretofore in Dodge Hall, a building contributed to that institution by Gen. Grenville M. Dodge. After the erection of Dewey Hall, a few years ago, the station was removed to Dewey Hall, in the second story. Within the last year they were authorized to print a weather map at Northfield, Vt., which has a circulation all through that State, western New Hampshire, and northern Massachusetts, and in printing that map they had to crowd the president of Norwich University out of his office, and the Chief of the Weather Bureau simply recommends the erection of a building there upon the ground belonging to Norwich University, which they can have free of expense. There is no room for them now.

Mr. PERKINS. I will do one of two things—I shall insist upon my point of order, or, after I ask some questions of the chairman of the committee, I may waive it.

Mr. SCOTT. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. PERKINS. The question does not interest me as to whether the chief picks out these places. But the question is whether at this time it is judicious to make so large an appropriation, no matter who picks them out. Now, it is proposed to appropriate at Mount Weather, Virginia, $15,000. That is for a house for the observer to live in?

Mr. SCOTT. That is to finish a building that is already partly constructed—for the completion of the physical laboratory and office buildings.

Mr. PERKINS. In addition to that there is an observatory building, and a heating and power station, $60,000. Now, what is that?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the administration building, of which I spoke, to replace one burned last October.

Mr. PERKINS. Then it says:

> For the acquisition of a site and the erection of a building at each of the following-named places.

Now, I would like to ask whether at these several places that are named there are weather observatory stations?

Mr. SCOTT. There are already weather observatory stations, and they have been established a long time.

Mr. PERKINS. Where observations are made?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. The object of this, then, is not to increase the work of the Weather Bureau, but to furnish a residence in each one of these buildings for the men who have charge of the Bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. Residence and office.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman think it is judicious, that it is economical, to furnish residences all over this land for the various people in light-houses and weather observatories, and heaven knows what else?

Mr. LAMB. If the gentleman will allow an interruption, I can make a statement that will satisfy the gentleman right away. These people rent houses and rooms now.

Mr. PERKINS. We are paying for it.

Mr. LAMB. And it is cheaper to buy with money at 2 per cent than to rent.

Mr. PERKINS. If the facts were as stated by my friend from Virginia, it would answer, but unfortunately I can not agree with him in regard to the facts. I know the fact that everywhere it has proved more expensive to own land than to rent. You may start with a great printing building, and advocate it on the ground of economy, but it does not hold good, because first you erect a most expensive building, then you must care for it, and changes have to be made according to the views of different ones who administer it. If I thought there was economy for the Government in owning these buildings, I would not raise the point of order, but I sincerely believe, based on the observations we all have, that outside of the great central buildings the Government owns in Washington, it costs the Government more for the purchase, repair, and maintenance of buildings and their modification than it does to pay rental.

Mr. SCOTT. As a general proposition I concur in what the gentleman from New York has said, but the Weather Bureau stations are constructed at no great expense.

Mr. PERKINS. Fifteen thousand dollars is a better house than most of us have in my part of the country.

Mr. SCOTT. The Government can better afford to build at that price than to pay $400 or $1,000 a year rent.

Mr. PERKINS. There is the cost of the building and constantly liability for repairs. It may be more agreeable to own your own home to live in, but it is much cheaper if you rent one. It is more of a luxury to own your own home than to rent one.

Mr. LAMB. Will not the gentleman withdraw his point of order and let us discuss these other questions at another time?

Mr. PERKINS. I think not.

Mr. SCOTT. There are other considerations aside from that of economy which entered into the judgment of your committee in making this recommendation. One of them is the fact that meteorological observations are of a great deal more value if they can be taken at the same elevation over a long period of years. Another reason is that in many of the towns and places where these stations are located there are no suitable quarters for the observer and his family.

Mr. PERKINS. Not suitable places?

Mr. SCOTT. In the building where the station is located; and yet in these small stations, where there is only one man, it is practically necessary that he live in the building where he takes his observations, because conditions frequently arise under which it would be of benefit to the service to have him on call at any time during the twenty-four hours.

Mr. PERKINS. If that is necessary, why not erect a cottage for the use of the observer? It certainly would not cost $15,000.

Mr. SCOTT. That is precisely what is done.

Mr. PERKINS. You can get a pretty good cottage at an expense of $15,000. That is a pretty good house.

Mr. SCOTT. But my friend does not understand. The $15,000 is to erect a building in which not only the observer and his family will live, but in which he will transact all his business as an observer. His instruments and all his apparatus are there.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman has stated that in all of these cases they had already started a station for many years.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I did not understand the gentleman. I did not mean to be understood as saying that any kind of buildings had been erected.

Mr. PERKINS. Where you have stations you have some men who observe?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly; we have the instruments and apparatus, but they are installed in rented quarters, and that is the reason we are asking that buildings be constructed.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Right at this point. Is it not true that the Government rents places to house the families of the observers in the different cities in which they are located, or do they rent their own houses and pay their rent out of their salaries?

Mr. SCOTT. In many cases, my information is, the Government rents the building in which the observer lives and the amount of rent is deducted from his salary. We have inquired into the matter specifically, and the Chief of the Bureau has always said that wherever a building, whether a rented building or a Government-owned building, was used by the observer, he paid for the use, or it was taken into consideration in fixing his salary.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Take it in my own town; our observatory is in the top of the post-office. The observer has a family and lives in town like any other citizen. Do I understand that the Government pays the house rent for the observer under those circumstances?

Mr. SCOTT. It either pays the house rent or takes it into consideration in fixing his salary if he rents at his own expense. The salary is greater where a man pays his own house rent than it is where a house is furnished to him.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then these people are a great deal better treated than the average employees of the Government.

Mr. SCOTT Oh, no.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. A clerk in this city at $1,800 or $1,200 or $900 is compelled to rent his own house if he has a family.

Mr. SCOTT. On the contrary, the gentleman will find if he investigates that the officials of the Weather Bureau are very moderately paid.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not if their houses are furnished.

Mr. SCOTT. If a man's house is furnished to him it is taken into account when fixing his salary.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I quite agree with my colleague from New York that this looks like extravagance. A few years ago I appealed for the establishment of a weather station in my home city of Syracuse, N. Y., and it was established there, and it was housed in the university buildings without expense to the Government. The Government does not pay a cent of rent.

Mr. SCOTT. In such a case as that neither the Bureau nor the committee would ever think of recommending the construction of a building.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Very well. If this committee, and if the Chief of the Bureau and other officials concerned were as anxious to be as economical and to find places for the housing of their instruments as they were in my city, they would not have to hire quarters. They could probably get them similarly located in Richmond and other places without expense to the Government, just for the sake of having the stations there for the accommodation of the people. Of course if they are given $15,000 to build one of these houses, they will not try to get a location rent free, as they did in Syracuse.

Mr. SCOTT. I am very certain that the Chief of the Bureau has never recommended the construction of a building under circumstances such as the gentleman from New York suggests.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the situation in my own city of Rochester, which I think must exist in most cities. In Rochester the instruments of the weather bureau are located on the top of one of the highest buildings, ten or twelve stories high. It is by far the best place in the city. It is the best field for observation. This location is given free to the Government, and even if the Government paid rent it would be the best place that it could occupy. Instead of occupying such an ideal location, to have these observations made from the second story of a building, part of which is occupied by the observer and his family as a residence, with the instruments perhaps 15 or 20 feet from the ground, seems to me by no means a change which should recommend itself to the good judgment of the committee. It would cost more and the result, I should think, would be far less satisfactory. It may be more comfortable to the observer, but not more valuable to the cause of science.

Mr. SCOTT. There is no proposal on the part of the Bureau or of the committee to erect an observatory building in any great city such as he suggests.

Mr. PERKINS. In Richmond, Va.; St. Joseph, Mo.; Fort Wayne, Ind., all flourishing towns, which have business buildings.

Mr. OLMSTED. Public buildings?

Mr. PERKINS. They surely have.

Mr. SCOTT. Very few of them could be used for observatories. Let me call attention to the situation in Dodge City, Kans., where the Chief has recommended for many years that a building be erected. It is imperative this year, in the judgment of the Chief, that a building should be provided there, for the reason that the rooms where the station is now located and where it has been located for thirty years are required by their owner for another purpose, and the rent will be advanced from $400 to at least $1,000 if the station is moved to the only other available place in the city. So it seems imperative that provision should be made for a building.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that in this bill, which allows a little over a million dollars for the Bureau, an appropriation for new buildings of $105,000, beside $75,000 for repairs in one year, is a very large amount? The total for new buildings is $180,000, over 10 per cent of the entire expense of the Bureau, in one single year. It seems to me it is growing fast indeed, and that is only for this year. There will be more asked next year. You will find just as many next year and the year after and for endless years to come.

Mr. SCOTT. My friend will remember that the last appropriation bill carried no appropriation for the construction of new buildings. A provision was inserted in the bill by the committee, but stricken out on a point of order on the floor of the House, so that there has been no appropriation for this purpose for two years. The gentleman must also remember that $75,000 of the sum which he quotes is accounted for by the provision for completing a building already under way and for restoring a building which was destroyed by fire.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask one other question, and then I am through. In line 20 is an appropriation of $18,000 for a printing office. We are spending $5,000,000 on printing already for one office. Why do we need another at $18,000?

Mr. SCOTT. That provision has been in the bill ever since I have had any acquaintance with it.

Mr. PERKINS. And have we not got the printing office done yet?

Mr. SCOTT. That same amount has been carried in every bill. It is absolutely essential that there should be a printing office at the Weather Bureau, for the reason that it is necessary to print the daily weather map, copies of which you see hung in the lobby, and which are sent all over the country, and many other official publications. A great deal of printing is required there which it would be a physical impossibility to have done at the general Printing Office.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Wisconsin also reserved points of order, but, so far as I am concerned, I am so persuaded by the eloquence of my friend from Kansas that I will withdraw my point of order—not my entire point, but the point of order from line 14, page 6, to the word "bureau," in line 3, page 7. Also the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that he take up one point of order at a time so as to avoid confusion.

Mr. PERKINS. I reserved several points of order, but I waive them all with the exception of the one which I make on the ground that it is new legislation, and that one is from the word "namely," line 3, page 7, to the word "dollars," line 6. The other points of order which I reserved I now waive. Whether the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to make them or not I do not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. To have the gentleman's point of order consistent, would he not strike out in lines 22 and 23 the words "for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a building," and so forth?

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman is correct. The point of order should begin on the words "for the acquisition of a site," line 22, page 6, and cover the introduction as well as the entire appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that the gentleman's point of order will begin at the words "for the acquisition of a site," line 22, page 6, and go to the word "dollars," on line 6, page 7?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the Clerk report what goes out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 22, after the word "dollars" all the rest of that page and all of the lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 down to and including the word "dollars," on page 7.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand points of order are reserved to the entire paragraph and are pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that.

Mr. MANN. The first part of the section reads as follows:

General expenses, Weather Bureau: Every expenditure requisite for and incident to the equipment and maintenance of meteorological observation stations in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda, including the purchase of stationery, furniture, instruments, storm-warning towers, and all other necessary supplies and materials.

I do not see any appropriation for it.

Mr. SCOTT. It appears at the end of the paragraph, "in all $852,000."

Mr. MANN. Then I will suggest to the gentleman that when he makes up another appropriation bill he does not interpose specific appropriations, with specific amounts appropriated for specific purposes, in the middle of a paragraph, where he proposes to appropriate a lump sum at the end.

Mr. SCOTT. I accept the suggestion with all humility, but my friend will realize that there never was an appropriation bill which did not in some of the paragraphs have a specific appropriation in the way of a limitation or in some other way.

Mr. MANN. I will submit that, having paid some observation to appropriation bills in the House, I never saw a paragraph so involved and so difficult to understand its meaning, with these items thrown in, as this one. I do not believe an auditing office could tell what is covered and what is not by the language used in this paragraph. The gentleman runs in after this provision I have read down here specific sums——

Mr. SCOTT. "Not to exceed" a certain sum, and that is the language in all appropriation bills where there is a limitation.

Mr. MANN. That is an appropriation.

Mr. SCOTT. It is a limitation, "Provided, That not to exceed" a certain sum should be devoted to a certain purpose. I confess I hardly know how a limitation could otherwise have been expressed.

Mr. MANN. It is a specific appropriation of $60,000 in one case—however, if it is covered, I do not care.

Mr. SCOTT. It is absolutey covered. I shall be only too happy to consult with the gentleman hereafter, as I know how valuable his suggestions would be.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not want the gentleman to consult with me.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I understand that no point of order is pending against this paragraph now excepting that relating to the construction of the separate buildings named.

The CHAIRMAN. There was a point of order reserved on the whole paragraph.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I would like to offer.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I requested in the beginning that the ground covered by the points of order be divided, and I trust they will be considered separately so that we may know where we are at all times.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I reserved the point of order generally to the paragraph, and as my point was directed to that which has been stricken out on the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS], I have only one other inquiry to make, subject to the point of order, and that is as to the word "evaporation." That is found in lines 15 and 16, on page 7. I notice that it is a new word in this bill from that of last year, and I would like to have some explanation from the chairman of the committee as to the reason for requiring some new service.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, as the members of the committee all know, there was a breach in the banks of the Colorado River some two or three years ago, as a result of which a great inland lake, called the Salton Sea was created. It is in an arid country, and the Chief of the Reclamation Service and the Chief of the Geological Survey are of the opinion that observations showing the rapidity of the evaporation of the water from that sea would be of great value in constructing reservoirs that may be needed hereafter in the Reclamation Service. They declare, as a matter of scientific fact, that many reservoirs have been built in the arid country which are uneconomically constructed, because the element of evaporation was not taken into account. Both the Chief of the Geological Survey and the Chief of the Reclamation Service have asked the Chief of the Weather Bureau to take charge of this project, to establish two or three observers upon the borders of this lake to note the rapidity of the evaporation of the waters, believing that the results they will get from those observations will be of great practical value hereafter in the continuation of the reclamation work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then this new service is clearly not for the benefit of the Weather Bureau service, but for some other service of the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. It is for the benefit of agriculture, which, in the arid region, is dependent upon the irrigation projects of the Reclamation Service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Of course I yield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it was called to my attention some time ago that they were making very important investigation and inquiry, most valuable scientific information, in connection with the theory of evaporation in the air, especially in connection with the Salton Sea—valuable for weather forecasts, valuable in a great many other ways, and especially valuable from the point of view which I took in respect to the Panama Canal. It was discovered that while we have had a notion that water evaporates according to the humidity of the air and the heat, in the Salton Sea, where the air is extremely dry and the temperature high, the evaporation of the water formed a blanket over the sea, not visible to the ordinary naked eye, and that blanket itself operated as a cloud close to the water to hold back the evaporation. It was a most important scientific discovery, if it be absolutely ascertained to be true, worth millions of dollars to the people and to the Government, and of great value in forecasting weather results where they are required to consider the evaporation both of the sea and of the lakes. If it can be established that evaporation of water upon a lake is not proportioned to the evaporation from a bucket, then all the computations which we have hitherto made as to the amount of evaporation at sea or on lakes or on the proposed Panama Canal will disappear and new computations will have to be made, because hitherto in testing evaporation of water at the Weather Bureau and by other branches of the Government and other tests, it has been common to take a small utensil—a bucket—and compute the amount of water which can be evaporated in a certain condition of the atmosphere and at a certain temperature by the amount of evaporation from this small utensil, which is not able to form a blanket of evaporative moisture over itself because the wind moves it away.

The Government is now inquiring at Panama in reference to the amount of evaporation in order to determine the quantity of water which may be used in connection with the locks on the Panama Canal, and I should say that if this investigation can proceed at very little expense to the Government, it will be worth millions of dollars, more than a million to one of the amount expended, if it shall be ascertained that the old theory of the amount of evaporation was false because based upon false premises and that water does not evaporate so rapidly in a large body.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If my friend will excuse me, it is believed by many observers, and that is the reason I speak of it, that a station should be established at Tucson, Ariz., and that is in the very line of the suggestion made by the gentleman. I was going to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not Mr. Moore did not report favorably on the establishment of a station at Tucson, Ariz. I have a letter from Mr. Moore to that effect. Now, in the line of the suggestion which the gentleman makes, it is believed by the people surrounding the Salton Sea, especially to the east of it, through southern Arizona and extending for hundreds of miles, that it has had a very material effect on the rainfall of that country. Now, if that be true, that a strata of air lies just on the surface of the water and stays there and prevents rapid evaporation in an intensely hot and dry country, it seems to me that the prevailing winds from the west over a sea not over a hundred miles—because it is less than that—would immediately dissipate the effect of which the gentleman speaks and would have probably a great climatic influence in the direction in which the wind was blowing and from which the damp airs come, at least; and the observation of the people there is they find rainfall at seasons of the year in much greater abundance than before. Now, whether it be a mere coincidence or whether one has relation to the other is a matter of doubt, and as yet there is no chance for anybody to know. It is a fact the rainfall has increased very much in Arizona within the last two years.

Mr. BURLESON. All the more reason why these observations should be made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. All the more reason why these observations should be made, and I am in favor of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, and I hope the point of order will be withdrawn.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not understand a point of order was made against the word "evaporation."

Mr. MANN. It was.

Mr. SCOTT. If it was, I desire to be heard upon it before the Chair rules.

Mr. MANN. I would like to make a further suggestion to the gentleman who makes the point of order. I believe this is an opportunity which seldom ever presents itself in the world for observations of equal value. The Salton Sea, of course, has no water running into it. It is now merely a matter of observing the rapidity and character of the evaporation. There is no other place on earth that I know of where similar conditions prevail. Elsewhere, in order to determine the amount of evaporation, the computers must also determine the amount of inflow, a more difficult thing to do even than to determine the amount of evaporation, but here we have made by accident a large lake with no inflow, where we have an opportunity to make observations which, in my judgment, are beyond measure in value; and if we do not make them now, we will not have an opportunity again, because never while we live will there be another Salton Sea.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of the point of order was to obtain information, and I withdraw the point of order that was reserved.

Mr. RUCKER. Just a moment. In view of the suggestions, or, perhaps, more accurately speaking, the criticisms which have been made in regard to the proposed legislation for the construction of buildings for Weather Bureau stations in the States which happen to be represented by members of the Committee on Agriculture, I want to say, my judgment is, the committee acted with intelligence and great patriotism——

Mr. MANN. Nobody doubts it.

Mr. RUCKER. You have doubted it.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. RUCKER. Or you would not have objected.

Mr. MANN. I did not object.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman ought not to indulge in criticisms——

Mr. MANN. I do not want the gentleman to be too tender to criticism. I did not criticise, but I called attention to that for the purpose of indicating what might happen in the future, when there might be reasonable objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I did not take the criticism seriously, though there were criticisms uttered. I want to say, too, that possibly a solution of all the trouble that has arisen in the gentleman's mind can be reached and removed if he will just recognize the fact that the members of the Agricultural Committee come from the great producing sections of our country, inspired with a purpose to do equal justice to all. I believe the greatest States in this Republic are represented by the members of the Committee on Agriculture, but I do not desire to provoke a discussion on this subject. So far as I am concerned, I have no apology whatever to make, coming as I do from the grand old State of Missouri, for trying faithfully and honestly to represent her interests. It is an honor of which any man may justly feel proud. The only reflection that disturbs me at this particular time is that there are several other gentlemen in my district, all good men, who have an ambition to serve their district and State in this capacity. [Laughter.] But I want to say, as I caught the drift of discussion here amid some confusion, gentlemen are constrained to criticise the language contained in the bill because it specifically names places where buildings are proposed to be constructed, and made a specific appropriation for them. The argument seemed to be that it would be better to make a lump-sum appropriation and allow the Chief of the Bureau to put the buildings where he deemed best.

Now, it seems to me, that as Congress is making the appropriation, the fairest thing, the most logical thing, the most reasonable thing that could be expected of the committee would be, after consultation with the Chief of the Bureau, to report to the House for its consideration, the places where, in the judgment of the committee, the buildings should be erected and the exact amount authorized to be used in the construction of those buildings.

Mr. Chairman, in order that the House may understand that, so far as St. Joseph, Mo., is concerned, it was not an excess of zeal on the part of the committee or any member of it which secured the favorable mention of that city in this bill, I desire to incorporate in my remarks a letter from the Chief of the Weather Bureau, Professor Moore. I want to say, too, to the Members of this House and to the gentleman who raised the point of order against this item and caused it to be stricken from the bill, that St. Joseph, Mo., the most important city in the United States which has no Weather Bureau station, has been further denied this service by his action; and not only the city, but the great agricultural and producing community adjacent to it must suffer inconvenience and loss by reason of the gentleman's hostile attitude. Hundreds of thousands and even millions of dollars' worth of farm products are every year produced in that immediate section, and the Chief of the Bureau says the service there would be of incalculable benefit to the great wealth producers of that section. But we recognize the gentleman's right to raise a point of order and insist upon it, and we must submit. In justice to the magnificent city of St. Joseph and myself, I desire to print as a part of my remarks some correspondence which I will not take time to read now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] asks unanimous consent to incorporate in his remarks in the RECORD certain documents. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The documents referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
WEATHER BUREAU, OFFICE OF THE CHIEF,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1908.

Hon. CHAS. F. BOOHER, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reference to the matter of establishing a Weather Bureau station at St. Joseph, Mo., I have the honor to say that this is the only city in the United States with a population of 100,000 and over (more than 70 miles from a Weather Bureau station) that has not a first-class Weather Bureau station. It is sufficiently removed from other stations so that an observation from there would be useful in the making of forecasts for the country farther east; but aside from the value of its observation to the rest of the country, its agricultural interests are such that they can be efficiently served only by the establishing of a first-class observatory and the printing of a daily weather map. The extensive horticultural interests of the vicinity will profit largely by the cold-wave warnings. St. Joseph is also a river town and would, therefore, be benefited by the flood service of the Bureau. If the committee in Congress decides to establish a station here, it will be necessary to add $2,500 to the fund for "salaries, station employees," and $2,500 to the fund for "general expenses." This will provide for the establishment of the station. In this connection, I will say that an appropriation of $15,000 should be made for a Weather Bureau building, so that when the station is once established it need not be changed. It is not generally known that meteorological records are valuable largely because of their length and because of the unchanged environment under which they are made. To change the altitude of the instruments and their surroundings renders it difficult to make comparison between the data, one year with the other, which is so essential in determining the question of the change of climate. It is, therefore, apparent that when the station is established it would be well to also erect an observatory building.

In conclusion, I do not hesitate to say that I do not know of a more deserving case than that of St. Joseph.

Yours, truly,

WILLIS L. MOORE,
Chief United States Weather Bureau.

BUSINESS MEN'S LEAGUE OF ST. JOSEPH, MO.,
December 16, 1907.

Hon. C. F. BOOHER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR Mr. BOOHER: The Commercial Conference Committee, embracing the following commercial and business organizations, Auditorium Company, Board of Trade, Business Men's League, Commercial Club, Contractors and Builders' Association, Grocers, Butchers, and Bakers' Association, Live Stock Exchange, Manufacturers' Association, Real Estate Exchange, Retail Druggists' Association, Retail Merchants' Association, South St. Joseph Business Men's Club, will have a meeting on the 19th instant, at which time resolutions will be adopted indorsing the movement for the establishment of weather observation bureau in this city. When the resolution is adopted, it will be addressed and forwarded to yourself.

Meanwhile, I beg to submit statistical and general information respecting St. Joseph.

In a number of important lines of merchandise, St. Joseph is the leading wholesale center west of the Mississippi River. We have sixty wholesale establishments, doing an annual business of approximately $65,000,000, representing the following lines: Boots and shoes, carpets and upholstering, clothing, confectionery and crackers, crockery, dry goods, drugs, electrical supplies, groceries, hardware, harness and saddlery, hats and caps, liquors and cigars, millinery, paints and oils, paper and stationery, photo supplies, produce, sporting goods, wall paper.

St. Joseph is an extensive market center for grains, fruits, vegetables, dairy products, and live stock—as a live-stock market ranking fourth in the United States. In the year 1906 shipments of live stock to the St. Joseph market totaled 52,871 carloads, aggregating in value $60,000,000.

The manufacturing interests of St. Joseph are rapidly developing. The annual report of the State labor bureau for the year 1906 places the value of our manufactured products at $68,611,786.

This market receives farm products from all the territory embraced in the Mississippi Valley, Missouri Valley, Mountain and Pacific States, and distributes merchandise and factory products throughout such territory.

The population of St. Joseph, per United States census for 1900, was 102,979; present population (estimated), 125,000.

The importance and diversity of our commercial interests, together with the extent of territory throughout which our business is conducted, should readily indicate the importance and need for daily weather observation reports.

Our principal daily papers have wide circulation in the Central Western States, and would carry these reports to a large number of people who are accustomed to receive their news information from St. Joseph.

Respectfully,

H. G. KRAKE, Commissioner.

THE COMMERCIAL CONFERENCE COMMITTEE,
St. Joseph, Mo., December 19, 1907.

Whereas St. Joseph is a city containing a population of approximately 125,000, transacting a wholesale business aggregating $65,000,000 annually, and maintaining important markets for live stock, grains, coal, fruits, vegetables, cream, and other farm, ranch, and mining products; and

Whereas St. Joseph, being the recognized commercial and market center for thousands of merchants and farmers throughout the Central Western, Mountain, and Pacific States, the establishment in this city of a Government weather observation bureau is most essential and fully warranted:

Resolved, That the commercial conference committee of St. Joseph, comprising the following business organizations, Commercial Club, Business Men's League, Retail Merchants' Association, Live Stock Exchange, South St. Joseph Business Men's Club, Board of Trade, Grocers, Butchers, and Bakers' Association, Retail Druggists' Association, Real Estate Exchange, Contractors and Builders' Association, Manufacturers' Association, and Auditorium Company, hereby concur in, and fully indorse the movement to secure such weather observation bureau; and it is further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be, by the secretary, communicated to Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER for presentation before the Committee on Agriculture at Washington, in an endeavor to have such weather bureau established.

OFFICE OF RETAIL MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION,
St. Joseph, Mo., December 19, 1907.

The Hon. C. F. BOOHER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Retail Merchants' Association of St. Joseph wishes to add its weight to the request for the establishment of a weather observation bureau in St. Joseph.

Personally, the writer knows that you will do all in your power for any interest affecting St. Joseph, and appreciates it for himself and for the association.

Very truly, yours, FRED'K NEUDORFF, President.

CITY OF ST. JOSEPH, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
St. Joseph, Mo., December 16, 1907.

Hon. CHAS. BOOHER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I desire to call your attention to the urgent demands for the establishment of a weather bureau in this city. All northwest Missouri and parts of Kansas, Iowa, and Nebraska, have no other means of readily receiving these reports, except as disseminated from this point.

I trust you will be able to interest the Chief of the Weather Bureau, and if there is anything that I can do, or say, I will be glad to have you call on me at any time.

Very truly,

WM. E. SPRATT,
Mayor of the City of St. Joseph, Mo.

ST. JOSEPH BOARD OF TRADE,
St. Joseph, Mo., January 4, 1908.

Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The St. Joseph Board of Trade concurs in and fully indorses an effort being made to secure for this city a Government weather observation station.

St. Joseph is the principal grain market for a large number of farmers throughout an extensive territory in the Missouri Valley, who would become directly interested in, and materially benefited by the installation of such weather observation service.

Your cooperation in this matter is earnestly solicited, and will, we assure you, be highly appreciated by us.

Respectfully, yours,

ST. JOSEPH BOARD OF TRADE,
By ROBT. R. CLARK, President.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand the Chair has ruled on the point of order made by the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. On the first point the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Then there is no other point of order pending?

The CHAIRMAN. No other point of order is pending.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] is recognized to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, before the word "telegraphing," insert "sending stamped slips containing weather forecasts over rural free-delivery routes."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve a point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] reserves a point of order.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, there is certainly no valid reason why this clause should not be inserted. It is right in the midst of a provision that weather forecasts shall be distributed over the telegraph lines and over the telephone lines, and the Weather Bureau desires also to distribute the weather forecasts through the medium of slips over these rural free-delivery routes. It is certainly consistent, reasonable, and right, and immediately in the connection where the weather forecasts are provided for in the remaining portion of the paragraph. Certainly no point of order is tenable to the amendment which is offered. If I could discuss the merits of the proposition, I would state that out of the large number of rural free-delivery routes in the United States there are comparatively very few of them which have the benefit of the weather forecasts.

It would incur very little additional expense to provide for the unprinted slips and have the stamps placed upon the slips indicating what the weather forecasts are in these places from which the rural routes originate, because of the fact that on all these routes, the points from which they originate in each and every one, so far as I am informed, there is already telegraph or telephone communication with the Weather Bureau, showing the condition of the weather and the forecast for the next twenty-four hours after the forecasts are sent in. That being the case, all that becomes necessary at all is that the Weather Bureau furnish the slips and stamps to stamp the slips each morning for the forecast for the twenty-four hours. We know now that in all these places from which these routes originate the weather forecasts are delivered. In the large majority of instances they are towns or cities in which there is no material interest in the forecast; but the agriculturists, who are out on the rural free-delivery routes, are the ones who are the most interested in these forecasts, and they are deprived of their benefit, because there is no way provided for communicating the forecasts to them in many instances.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that these reports are sent out?

Mr. WATKINS. There are in some instances forecasts sent out, but I know in the State of Louisiana, at somewhere in the neighborhood of 100 of these routes there is not a single instance, unless, perhaps, with one exception, at which these forecasts are sent out; and if this authority is given the Bureau would not hesitate to send them out.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not a fact that the failure to send out the forecasts to the farmer is the fact that the rural carrier starts before the forecasts are received?

Mr. WATKINS. In many instances that is the fact and in many instances it is not the fact. In the great majority of instances they start after the forecasts could be delivered. It is so in my district. There are a number of instances in which they could be sent out if this provision was made allowing it to be done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana to the fact that this portion of the paragraph provides for the payment of the service required in sending out these forecasts, telephones, and telegraphs, but it would not be available for the purpose he suggests. There would be no compensation paid to the rural carriers. It is merely a matter of administration; the Department does it now in many places, and would do it in other places if it were feasible.

Mr. WATKINS. It is necessary, because it does require some expense for the unprinted slips and stamps to be placed upon the slips to be used in giving the forecast for the twenty-four hours.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word about the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Louisiana. While I do not think it subject to the point of order, I do think it is entirely unnecessary. Under the organic law which created the Department the Secretary undoubtedly has a perfect right to distribute information which he may acquire, and the distribution of the weather forecasts is being made all over the country now wherever the rural routes start at such a time as will make the forecasts of any value to their patrons. So that it seems to me the amendment ought to be voted down, because it is wholly unnecessary, and I hope that the House will take that view.

Mr. WATKINS. Will it not be considered, if this is voted down, that there is no authority or sanction for it?

Mr. SCOTT. Not at all. I am sure that the Secretary will realize, if it is voted down, that such action was taken because there was no necessity for inserting it.

Mr. WATKINS. If it is not amenable to the point of order, and is voted down by the House, do you not think that that will be an instruction of the House to the Secretary that he should not send them out?

Mr. SCOTT. By no means. I do not think that he would regard that as an instruction.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the House I desire to say that Professor Moore makes the following statement:

As to the distribution of special forecasts and special warnings, there are at Government expense 2,282 forecasts distributed by telegraph every morning; by mail there are 78,000 distributed; by rural route delivery, 71,000, and by telephone there are little short of 2,000,000 distributed, free of charge to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist upon the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I intend to, but the gentleman from Tennessee desires to be heard.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if it is not the law, it should be, we all agree.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If it is not the law, we want to make it the law, because it will give important information to the farmer.

Now, as little as you may think it, I used to be a first-class farmer, and I know that many a time I have wished to know whether it was going to rain this afternoon or to-morrow or the next day, so that I might conduct my farming affairs accordingly.

But I will say to my friend, for his information and that of the committee, that out on the rural routes in Davidson County, when I go out to the old home where I was born and reared, I see the rural carrier having on the side of his little wagon the weather forecast for the day.

Mr. WATKINS. Is that in the form of the little slips which are made to go into the boxes?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He has a little flag for dry weather or a flag for wet weather, or something that everybody understands.

Mr. WATKINS. But nobody except those who see the flag can tell what the weather is going to be.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I quite agree with the gentleman that if this is not the law it ought to be. Everybody ought to be glad to look at the flag, and I would rather look at the flag than a piece of paper.

Mr. MANN. Wet or dry?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Whether wet or dry. Now, if this is not the law, the Secretary of Agriculture and our efficient Weather Bureau man, Mr. Moore, should be given the authority. If he is doing it without authority, the greater the reason why the gentleman's amendment should be made the law. My friend from Vermont has just read from the hearings. He tells us what Mr. Moore does; but if there is no authority for it, he has no right to do it. This is a Government of laws and not of men. Now, I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, is there any law requiring rural carriers to give the farmers this weather information?

Mr. SCOTT. There is no question but what the law authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to distribute the weather forecasts in any way he may see fit.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is no question but what they do in fact distribute the information.

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly they do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the carriers down in Louisiana are not treating the gentleman's constitutents right.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. Some of the postmasters have declined to send out these forecasts after they were furnished to them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now we have found the nigger in the wood pile. The postmasters down in Louisiana are not doing their duty, and I do not blame the Representative from that district for calling it to the attention of this body. The people down there are entitled to this information. Now, I do not know whether the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] has ever been a farmer or not. He has a lot of hard horse sense, which convinces me that he has been a farmer and a good one. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I say if this is not the law, it ought to be, and I am for it.

With $35,000,000 appropriated recently for the rural service, with 40,000 routes, and 38,000 rural carriers, we have the great power and a great machine to scatter this information amongst the farmers who need it. I will insert in the RECORD a list of the very first rural routes that were established in this country in 1896, when the salaries paid the carriers then were from $150 to $300—that is, in 1896—which have been increased from time to time until the maximum salary now is $900. Previous to 1897, back to 1894, when our first rural-delivery act was passed, Congress only appropriated $40,000, but no routes were established until 1896. The Annual Report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the Fiscal Year ended June 30, 1899, giving history and the development of the rural free delivery, prints the following:

ORIGINAL RURAL SERVICE.

The forty-four "widely divergent" routes selected for the experiment by Postmaster-General Wilson were located in twenty-nine States. In order of date of their establishment they were as follows:

"October 1, 1896: Halltown, Uvilla, and Charles Town, W. Va.;
"October 15, 1896: Hartsville and Hope, Ind.; Collinsville, Darrtown, Elba, and Somerville, Ohio; Westminster, Md.; and Cairo, Mo.;
"October 19, 1896: Clarksville, Ark.;
"October 22, 1896: Palmyra, Va.;
"October 23, 1896: China Grove, N. C.;
"October 26, 1896: Bonner Springs, Kans.;
"November 1, 1896: Thibodeaux, La.;
"November 2, 1896: Bernardstown and Greenfield, Mass.;
"November 7, 1896: Tecumseh, Nebr.;
"November 10, 1896: Loveland, Colo., and Morning Sun, Iowa;
"November 16, 1896: Sun Prairie, Iowa;
"November 23, 1896: Gorham, Naples, and Sebago Lake, Me., and Orange, Mass.;
"November 24, 1896: New Stanton and Ruffsdale, Pa., and Tempe, Ariz.;
"November 25, 1896: North Deering, Me.;
"December 1, 1896: South Deerfield, Mass.;
"December 3, 1896: Climax, Mich.;
"December 7, 1896: Opelika, Ala., and Brunswick, Me.;
"December 8, 1896: Quitman Ga.;
"December 10, 1896: Auburn, Ill.;
"December 21, 1896: Grand Isle, Vt., and Lancaster, Pa.;
"January 1, 1897: Farmington, Minn., Allensville, Ky., and Atoka, Tenn.;
"February 1, 1897: Campbell, Cal.; and "April 1, 1897: North Yakima, Wash.

The development of the rural delivery system, though delayed in starting and was experimental down to July 1, 1902, has been very wonderful. Its history is most interesting, and I am sure that none of us regret that Congress did not in 1900 nor 1902 nor 1904 adopt the contract star-route system instead of the rural delivery system. I will insert as part of my remarks a most interesting letter on the subject of this system:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, March 17, 1908.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Recurring to your personal call at the Department, at which time you requested information as to the various salaries paid rural carriers during each year since the beginning of rural delivery to date, and the amount of the annual appropriations made on account of rural delivery, I take pleasure in submitting the information, as follows:

Rates of pay to rural carriers.

	Per annum.
1896	$150–300
1897 maximum	300
1898 do	400
1899 do	400
1900 (July 1) do	500
1901 do	500
1902 (March 2) do	600
1903 do	600
1904 (July 1) do	720
1905 do	720
1906 do	720
1907 (July 1) do	900

The status of rural delivery, as a permanent branch of the postal service, was not fixed by law until July 1, 1902. Prior to that date the appropriations were made on account of experimental rural free delivery, and the Department exercised its discretion in fixing the annual rate of pay to carriers. Prior to March 2, 1902, when the maximum annual rate paid rural carriers was raised to $600, the maximum salary of $500 was paid substantially to all rural carriers regardless of the length of their routes, excepting where the routes were quite short. In the earliest days of rural delivery, however, the rates of compensation to carriers were fixed not only in accordance with the length of the carriers' routes, but with the nature of the country in which they were situated and the number of patrons served.

On July 1, 1902, the rural carriers' salary schedule was arranged upon a mileage basis, as follows:

	Per annum.
Routes not less than 20 miles	$600
Under 20 and not less than 16 miles	500
Under 16 and not less than 12 miles	400
Under 12 and not less than 8 miles	300
Under 8 and not less than 4 miles	200

This schedule continued in effect until July 1, 1904, when the maximum salary was raised to $720 per annum, when it was rearranged, as follows:

	Per annum.
24 miles and over	$720
23 to 24 miles	702
22 to 23 miles	684
21 to 22 miles	666
20 to 21 miles	648
18 to 20 miles	612
16 to 18 miles	576
14 to 16 miles	540
12 to 14 miles	504
10 to 12 miles	468
8 to 10 miles	432

On July 1, 1907, incident to the increase in carriers' salaries to a maximum of $900 per annum, the schedule now in effect was arranged, as follows:

	Per annum.
24 miles and over	$900
22 to 24 miles	864
20 to 22 miles	810
18 to 20 miles	720
16 to 18 miles	630
14 to 16 miles	540
12 to 14 miles	504
10 to 12 miles	468
8 to 10 miles	432
6 to 8 miles	396

In the early days of rural delivery, carriers were permitted to augment the compensation paid them by the Department by acting as agents for newspapers and doing a general express business with practically no restrictions. However, on July 19, 1901, an order was issued by the Postmaster-General that on and after that date rural carriers should not act as agents, salesmen, or solicitors for express companies, letter-box manufacturers, wholesale houses, corporations, or firms, nor engage in any business or avocation which would interfere with the proper performance of their official duties; that they may act as news agents, sell newspapers, or periodicals on their own account, or accept and collect subscriptions for the same; but if carriers received newspapers or periodicals by express or by other means outside the mails, they, as news agents, were required to pay postage on such matter at the second-class rate of 1 cent per pound, except in the case of county newspapers.

The order was not intended to prohibit carriers from performing various private commissions for the accommodation of patrons, so long as it did not interfere with the regular performance of their duties, and carriers were permitted to carry merchandise, or what is known as fourth-class matter, for hire for and upon request of their patrons.

The order continued in effect until the act making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1904, when rural carriers were prohibited from acting as agents for any person, firm, or corporation, but were permitted to carry express matter for hire for and upon request of patrons of their routes under such regulations as the Postmaster-General might prescribe.

In prescribing regulations the Department construed the act to mean that rural carriers could not carry mailable matter outside of the mails nor act as agents for newspaper publishers or others, nor solicit or receive subscriptions to newspapers, but could carry unmailable merchandise for hire for their patrons, and an order was issued by the Postmaster-General accordingly.

The following table shows the annual appropriations for experimental rural free delivery and rural delivery after having been put upon a permanent basis:

Experimental:
1897	$40,000
1898	50,250
1899	150,032
1900	450,000
1901	1,750,796
1902	4,089,075
Permanent:
1903	$8,586,364
1904	12,926,905
1905	21,116,600
1906	25,828,300
1907	28,350,000
1908	34,900,000

Very respectfully,

P. V. DE GRAW,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear from the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] on his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This amendment is offered at the place where provision is made for service in carrying the information, and it is not germane to the part of the bill to which it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman point out any other part of the bill where it would be germane?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I assume that that burden would be on the gentleman who desires to have the amendment adopted; but in deference to the request of several gentlemen about me, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GAINES of Tennessee) there were—ayes 40, noes 45.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. WATKINS and Mr SCOTT.

The committee again divided, and there were—ayes 48, noes 58.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, after the word "dollars," in line 22, insert—

"For the acquisition of sites and the erection of new buidings for the use of the Weather Bureau, and for all necessary labor, materials, and expenses, plans and specifications to be prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the work done under the supervision of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, not to exceed $40,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make a point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I raise the point of order against that amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman offering the amendment show the Chair some authority of law?

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, I concede that it is subject to a point of order, but I understood that the point of order would not be raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment in the interest of the Hawaiian Territory. I move to strike out of lines 8 and 9, page 6, the words "in the Hawaiian Islands."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "in the Hawaiian Islands."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I will read the first part of this paragraph.

Every expenditure requisite for and incident to the equipment and maintenance of meteorological observation stations in the United States and in the West Indies, or on adjacent coasts in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda—

And so forth.

I understand the Hawaiian Territory is not a separate organization or mere dependency, and that it is as much a part of the United States now as Arizona, New Mexico, Alaska, or any other Territory. I think we have fallen into the habit of thinking of the Hawaiian Territory simply as island possessions, and I think these words should be stricken out, leaving in the paragraph to include the Hawaiian Islands the language "in the United States," which is used in the bill to include all our other Territories.

If this is not done, then the word "Islands" should be struck out and the word "Territory" should be substituted therefor in the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be safer to say "in the continental United States?"

Mr. KEIFER. The bill does not say "in the continental United States." It says "United States," and that includes all the Territories, as I understand it, and renders it unnecessary to mention any Territory. It may not be material to the bill, but it is time that we recognize the Hawaiian Territory, as it is and as it has long since come to be—that is, as a part of the United States. It is an organized Territory under laws of Congress. It has a governor, a legislature, and its own courts, and, in short, it has just as much of an organization and more than Alaska, and as much as Arizona, New Mexico, or any other Territory, and it should be treated in our legislation on this bill the same as we treat all the other Territories of the United States. It is a misnomer to speak of the Hawaiian Territory as the Hawaiian Islands. If my amendment is agreed to this Territory will be on a footing with all our other Territories, as it should be.

Mr. SCOTT. Of course the language which the gentleman's amendment seeks to strike out was inserted solely in the interest of clearness, so that there might not be any misunderstanding. If it will be understood that the adoption of this amendment will not put it out of the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to maintain a station in the Hawaiian Islands, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "grounds," in line 14, page 6, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 22, page 6.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the effect of that amendment, if adopted, would be to prevent the expenditure of $15,000 for the construction of a cottage that is to be used, as I understand it, as a summer resort. And it would also strike out of the bill the proposed appropriation of $60,000 which is intended to be expended in the construction of a building at Mount Weather, Virginia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the respective amounts used for summer-resort purposes and those which are used for Weather Bureau purposes?

Mr. MADDEN. It would be difficult to segregate them in this bill. I doubt if anybody could tell how much was being used for each purpose. Perhaps if I could, it might be easier for us to agree on how much we would appropriate and how much we would strike out.

My understanding of this bill is that it is intended to appropriate money for the development of the agricultural interests of the country, and I am not sufficiently convinced that these items to which my amendment refers are of sufficient intimate relationship with the agricultural interests of the country to entitle them to favorable consideration.

In the first instance, I understand these observatory buildings when established, or those about to be established, are without any authority of law, simply upon the order of the head of this Bureau. Whether any law has ever been enacted giving authority to the head of this Bureau I am not prepared to say. However that may be, it seems that the amount appropriated is a good deal larger than it should be, larger than is required for the service for which these buildings are to be used.

I am rather fearful that we are reaching a stage very rapidly when every town in the United States will look forward to the erection of an observatory building, and we will soon find ourselves in the position of logrolling for buildings, as we find to be the case now in the matter of the public-buildings bill. My judgment is, without having any scientific knowledge of the subject, that we are going a little too fast in the matter of expenditures for this purpose. We ought to go slowly. We should exercise proper economy. We ought not to erect buildings anywhere except where they are needed. There ought to be a well-defined, systematic plan laid out under which buildings should be erected, in order that we may be able to get the best service possible, and this haphazard method of allowing the Department to determine when a building shall be constructed, and where, without knowing why, ought to be stopped.

The sooner it is stopped the better. False economy, I know, is the cry on the floor of this House, but the conservation of the public funds in the proper way is not false economy, and I am constrained to believe that the time has come when more rigid supervision of the funds of the public should be had than is being exercised now.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if the information upon which the gentleman's amendment is predicated were correct, there should of course be no adverse vote in the House to the amendment. It happens, however, that his information is not correct. It is not true that a summer-resort cottage is being erected there. The building that is now under construction, and for the completion of which $15,000 is needed, is intended for a physical laboratory and office, a purely physical function, so that there is absolutely no ground for the charge the gentleman has made.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish to be understood as saying that there is no part of this expenditure to be made for a building to be used for private purposes?

Mr. SCOTT. It may be that in this physical laboratory building one or two rooms will be made for the use of the observer who conducts the scientific work there.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, just what are the facts?

Mr. SCOTT. The facts are exactly as I have stated them in regard to the $15,000.

Mr. MANN. That includes the cottage building, too.

Mr. SCOTT. As to the $60,000, that is another proposition which I will discuss when we come to it.

Mr. MADDEN. What do the two words "cottage building" mean in this connection?

Mr. SCOTT. It is simply descriptive of the architectural type of the building.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no attempt whatever to construct the building for private purposes?

Mr. SCOTT. Absolutely none, except as I have stated, that two or three rooms——

Mr. MADDEN. How many rooms?

Mr. SCOTT. Not to exceed two rooms, I understand, to be reserved for the observer to be in charge of the scientific apparatus there.

Mr. MADDEN. How many observers are there to be?

Mr. SCOTT. I think only one.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should the cost come to $15,000?

Mr. SCOTT. That includes equipment, and there is extensive scientific apparatus to go in, too.

Mr. MADDEN. This does not say anything about equipment.

Mr. SCOTT. It does not need to say anything about it, for the reason that it is carried in other language in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. If it is carried in other language in the bill it can not be included in this $15,000.

Mr. SCOTT. I mean the authority for the expenditure of $15,000, or some part of it for apparatus, is carried in other language in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the man who is to be in charge of this observatory to live in the house that is being built as an observatory?

Mr. SCOTT. I understand that there may be two or three rooms reserved for the use of this observer. What the gentleman has said has left the impression, doubtless, that Mount Weather is a town, and that there is local influence, perhaps, being brought to bear upon the committee to get us to erect a public building there. The truth of the matter is that Mount Weather is a point high up on the Blue Ridge, about 6 miles from any town. There was not anything there to start with, I believe, but an indifferent farmhouse when this station was first established. We employ there about fifteen men—experts and employees of various sorts—and it is absolutely necessary that they should live at this point and live in the building which the Government is erecting.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any need for the Government to build a town for fifteen men?

Mr. SCOTT. The Government proposes only to build one house, which shall cost $50,000, and I submit that $50,000 is not an unreasonable amount to be expended for the construction of a building in which fifteen men are to live day and night for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year.

Mr. MADDEN. This building costs $60,000 and the other $15,000, and that makes $75,000.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman does not understand the language of the bill. The $15,000 is for the completion of the physical laboratory and office building, which is already under way. Fifty thousand dollars will be expended in the erection of an administrative building, to take the place of one that is burned, and $10,000 will be used to build a power plant to supply power to all of the buildings at the station.

Mr. MADDEN. How much money has already been expended at this point?

Mr. SCOTT. In the neighborhood of $200,000; something less that $200,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the money which has been expended so far been properly authorized?

Mr. SCOTT. It was the opinion of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture that the expenditure was properly authorized, and I should like to read for the information of the Members of the House a paragraph from the report of the Littlefield committee, which is as follows:

We are of the opinion that with so much money being annually spent in the making of forecasts and storm warnings, which everyone agrees to have a great value to the various industries of the country, it is a wise economy to devote a reasonable amount of money to the carrying on of experimentation at one of the many stations of the Weather Bureau, so that the science that is back of the art of forecasting may be improved, and that thereby the annual expenditures for the support of the Weather Bureau may have a greater value to the people. We find no evidence of extravagance or misapplication of funds in the creation of the institution at Mount Weather, which we believe to have been worthily conceived and the plan so far to have been efficiently executed.

And it is for the progress of this worthily conceived and efficiently executed work that we have asked this appropriation to be made.

Mr. MADDEN. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the attitude of my colleague, as I do the attitude of all the members of the committee, in favor of economy in appropriations, and with all the talk that was had last year about Mount Weather, it is a suspicious item in the bill and worthy of consideration, but it seems to me that the amendment ought not to prevail, and Mount Weather ought not to be stricken out. One of the most remarkable scientific pieces of information which has been obtained for years, of any kind, was ascertained not very long ago at Mount Weather. We all know that as a matter of fact the air gets colder in temperature the higher up you go, and it has been assumed for many years that the temperature of the air rises in almost a regular ratio as you go higher in the air. I believe Members of the House understand that at Mount Weather there is a kite sent up every day to make observations of the air for several miles in height as to the temperature, the humidity, and other conditions of the atmosphere. In one of the ascents that was made last fall, at a time when they were extremely anxious to forecast the weather properly, it was discovered that the air 2 or 3 miles high was considerably warmer than the air nearer the earth and between the ground and the point at that height a large area in thickness of air was at a warmer temperature. It was a remarkable fact which had not been thought of by anyone. It had not been supposed that the temperature of air 3 or 4 miles high could remain for a considerable distance in thickness of a warmer temperature than the air next to the earth's surface. If it can be developed that in the movement of the air on the earth's surface you can ascertain by these kites the condition of the temperature of air 3 or 4 miles high and thereby tell the humidity and the barometric pressure, it will be possible very likely in the near future to forecast weather with a much greater degree of certainty than now exists, and this experimental work that is being carried on there is of immense importance. I had the pleasure last night of listening to a gentleman who is giving much attention to the discovery of conditions upon the planet Mars, where he said he was almost able from this earth to forecast precisely, from year to year, the condition of the atmosphere and the condition of the weather on Mars.

We have not attained that degree of knowledge upon this earth yet, but as time goes on, with the sun the same, with the heat coming to the earth the same, with the evaporation the same, we ought, as time goes on, be able to a far greater degree of certainty predict the weather in advance, if we may not in the end even influence the weather in advance, and this experimental work in this connection is of great value in meteorological observations.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand that the gentleman says it is possible to predict the weather in Mars?

Mr. MANN. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand this astronomer says it is possible if sufficient appropriations be made to predict the weather in Mars as well as in Virginia? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman they are able to do that now without any appropriation, and even the gentleman, a very distinguished scientist himself, if he had the information that could be easily given to him by Professor Powell, could predict the weather on Mars four years from now.

Mr. PERKINS. I am sorry to say I have not the information.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. How do they know whether their predictions come true or not?

Mr. MANN. There is no trouble about that.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a few questions.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall be pleased to answer, if I can.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Where did the money come from that erected this Mount Weather observatory—what appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. There were appropriations made through a series of years for the construction of Weather Bureau buildings, on the different appropriation bills for the support of the Department of Agriculture, and it was from the money thus appropriated that the buildings now at Mount Weather were constructed.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Was not this Mount Weather building constructed out of funds that the Committee on Agriculture supposed, when they were appropriating the money, was for the purpose of building separate buildings throughout the United States?

Mr. SCOTT. There was a difference of opinion on the part of the members of the committee in respect to that matter. Some of the members of the committee testified before the Littlefield committee last year that they understood from the beginning that part of the money appropriated, as I have suggested, was to be expended at Mount Weather, and other members of the committee testified that they did not so understand it, that on the contrary they understood, as the gentleman's query implies, that the money thus appropriated was to be used in the construction of separate weather buildings.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. What was the gentleman's opinion at that time? He was a member of the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. My opinion at the time was that the money appropriated in each of the appropriation bills was to be used for the construction of separate buildings. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that such was my opinion.

Mr. BURLESON. Right in connection with that I will say that I was on the subcommittee at the time the appropriations were being made, and I think it is fair to the Chief of this Bureau to state that my impression and understanding at the time were that some of the money was to be expended at Mount Weather.

Mr. SCOTT. The remark of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] confirms what I have just said, that there was a difference of opinion or a difference of understanding, rather, on the part of members of the same committee in respect to this matter.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Was it not the opinion of the committee during the Fifty-ninth Congress, and was it not the opinion of the gentleman himself, that the money that the Chief of the Weather Bureau built this building over here in Mount Weather with was misdirected, and it should have been used for the building of small buildings instead of concentrating all into this large observatory over at Mount Weather, and did not the gentleman so testify before the Littlefield committee himself?

Mr. SCOTT. I can not speak, of course, for any member of the committee except myself, but I have already stated that it was my understanding that the appropriations made from year to year were to be used in the erection of separate weather buildings. But will the gentleman permit me to suggest that this whole matter was thrashed out at great length before the Littlefield committee last year, and I read only a moment ago from the report of that committee a very strong statement to the effect that there had been no misappropriation or misdirection of funds in connection with the station at Mount Weather? That statement seemed to be accepted as conclusive by the membership of this House.

Mr. BURLESON. And every building provided for was constructed, and whatever fund was diverted to Mount Weather was a saving from these buildings.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Has the chairman of the committee the testimony taken before the Littlefield committee?

Mr. SCOTT. I think it is in my office. I do not have it here.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think you have it right there.

Mr. SCOTT. I had a copy of the report, not of the testimony, which the reporters have taken, and I can not lay my hands on it now.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I thought I saw it on the table a moment ago.

Mr. SCOTT. It was here a moment ago, but since the gentleman returned it to me the House reporter has taken it to fill in his notes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 8, after "dollars." insert:

"For the establishment of a Weather Bureau station at Tucson, Ariz., not to exceed $5,000."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in view of the action this afternoon I am obliged to reserve the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I understand if the point of order is made it will have to go out. I can hardly expect to convince anyone except from the aid I have been given by the gentleman from Illinois this afternoon. The wonderful discoveries made by Professor Lowell as to Mars were made at Flagstaff, Ariz., every one of them. He has startled the scientific world by these discoveries. If, in addition to this study of the planets, we could get a good bureau established at Tucson, Ariz., in the rarest atmosphere that visits the earth or the heavens, and we could get such provision for kites as you have at Mount Weather, and try at these two remote points tests of the air, its temperature, its currents, and possibly its weight; if we could do these things at these two widely separated points we might finally procure information from the Weather Bureau of much greater certainty.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. I merely wanted to know if the weather is not so light there it would not fly a kite at all? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, you might make the kite lighter, but that even would not be necessary, for the drier the air is the heavier it is. We call it light because it lays no burden on the lungs of man or beast. I understand that Mr. Moore, having these Weather Bureau stations in charge, has recommended the establishment of a bureau at Tucson and my amendment is carrying out that recommendation. If there were no other reason for the establishment of this bureau at Tucson, it would be justified in showing, as it would show to the world, where to go to escape the winter freezes and the summer cyclones, so common elsewhere. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order. The preceding section is as much subject to the point of order as my amendment is, and I would make the point of order on it, except that I would do nothing to injure my friend from Colorado. I will not play the dog in the manger. An observatory has been kept at private expense for many years at Tucson by Mr. Whetmore, who, realizing the necessity of the same, has been active in efforts to secure Government aid to perfect the observations. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I feel I must insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the Clerk correct the totals to correspond with the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be necessary for the gentleman to reduce the total, $105,000.

Mr. SCOTT. I have asked consent that the Clerk correct the totals.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But there is no correction to be made. This provides that not more than $105,000 shall be spent for a certain purpose. It is still available for other purposes.

Mr. SCOTT. It seems to me that the request I made would cover the case entirely.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The intention is to reduce by the amount taken out on the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly. I move the committee do now rise.

The committee accordingly rose, and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FOSTER, of Vermont, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RANSOM FOR RELEASE OF MISS ELLEN M. STONE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read, and with accompanying papers referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress a letter from the Secretary of State on the subject of the repayment to the contributors of the money raised to pay the ransom for the release of Miss Ellen M. Stone, an American missionary to Turkey, who was abducted by brigands on September 3, 1901, while traveling on the highway from Raslog to Djumabala, in the Turkish Empire.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that Senate bill 3023 be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 24, after the words "SEC. 8," insert the following:

That after January 1, 1909, national banking associations located outside of reserve or central reserve cities, which are now required by law to keep a reserve equal to 15 per cent of their deposit liabilities, shall hereafter hold in their own vaults four-fifths of such reserves, either in lawful money as now required by law, or in the securities enumerated in section 2 of this act, which shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That not more than one-third of the reserves required to be kept in the vaults of such associations shall be held in such securities.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the amendment I offered yesterday afternoon is in regard to the reserves required to be held by other than reserve banks. The Senate will understand that under the present law country banks—that is, banks not in reserve cities—are required to hold 15 per cent of their deposits, and of this 9 per cent can be kept with reserve agents in reserve cities. My amendment requires that of the 15 per cent 12 per cent shall be kept by the home banks or the country banks in their vaults, and of this 12 per cent one-third may be held in the bonds specified as security for emergency currency in circulation under the proposed act.

The effect of the amendment, if adopted, would be that it would withdraw from New York and other reserve cities at least 6 per cent of the reserve that now may be held with reserve agents. The calculation I have made is that that would withdraw from New York and other reserve cities about $200,000,000, and to that extent it would put some substantial check upon the use of this reserve money by these banks in aid of speculation. It would strengthen the home banks by requiring them to keep in their vaults at all times 12 of the 15 per cent of their reserves, either in actual money or in money and bonds upon which money could be procured in an emergency.

I have heard it suggested on this floor that it would not be of much service to the home banks to have these bonds upon which they could procure currency because of the time that would be required to obtain it. But, as I understand it, under the provisions of the bill this money can be procured at any subtreasury of the United States, and I think that there are few localities in the country where the money could not be procured within twenty-four hours from some subtreasury of the United States.

I think that the adoption of the amendment would not only strengthen the home banks, but would enable them to meet the demands of their depositors much better than at present and not tie up their reserves a thousand miles away from home. We all know how the banks in the country were unable to procure from New York the money they had on reserve with their reserve agents when they needed it most.

My information now is that one of the troubles that we are confronting is not so much the disasters that the panic has already caused, but the banks themselves have not yet recovered from the panic and they are holding very large amounts of cash in their vaults pending legislation on this question. I have information from some banks in my own State that they are holding as much as 70 per cent of their deposits practically in their vaults, and so long as that condition of affairs continues the road to recovery and to normal conditions will be very slow.

Mr. President, I think this amendment is about as far as we can safely go. Some gentlemen on this side have advocated that the whole reserve required should be kept in the vaults of the banks. I think that would require too much money to be withdrawn from circulation in ordinary times. All the banks must keep some balances in the central reserve cities, and to permit them to keep as small as 3 per cent of the 15 per cent there would give them a margin for their exchange business and enable them to carry it on without any serious detriment to their business.

For these reasons I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, this amendment has been considered by the Finance Committee and approved by it. If any change is to be made in the reserves I think the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama is a conservative one, and in an intelligent manner, and the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. GORE. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "in the securities enumerated in section 2 of this act" the words:

Or cotton warehouse receipts, or grain elevator receipts, not to exceed 75 per cent of the face value of the receipt or the products represented.

Mr. President, those are quick assets and would give an element of elasticity to the currency, or rather to the bank credits, when most needed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 7 of the amendment, after the words "or in the securities enumerated in section 2 of this act," insert:

Or cotton warehouse receipts, or grain elevator receipts, not to exceed 75 per cent of the face value of the receipt or products represented.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I would suggest to the chairman of the Finance Committee and the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Texas that the most orderly proceeding in reference to this matter of reserves would be to first take a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, which proposes to repeal entirely the matter of reserves.

Mr. ALDRICH. That can be easily reached if the Senator from Texas proposes his amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. There is no parliamentary difficulty in the procedure, if the Senator from Texas desires it.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment which I propose was offered yesterday, and while it is not immediately pending it is before the Senate. It occurred to me, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, to offer it after the bill had been perfected so far as amendments were concerned as to the partial deposit of the reserves. In other words, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama does not go as far as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota or myself.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, as I understand it, is that fourth-fifths of the 15 per cent reserve of country banks shall be kept in the banks and the balance may be deposited in reserve cities or in central reserve cities. Inasmuch as that only affects existing law partially, it occurred to me best to have a vote upon it and afterwards a vote upon the amendment which I offered, which requires all of the 15 per cent to be retained by the country banks and 25 per cent by the reserve banks. I am willing to adapt myself to the convenience and pleasure of the Senator, however.

Mr. NELSON. It was only a suggestion of mine. I thought perhaps we might first vote on the amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON]. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I believe I will ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Secretary please read the amendment to the amendment again?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE], who is not present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. An arrangement has been made whereby I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who is absent.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN. By an arrangement of pairs, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], with whom I am paired generally, will upon this vote be paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—3.

Gore	McLaurin	Overman

NAYS—56.

Aldrich	Cullom	Gary	Paynter

So Mr. GORE's amendment to Mr. JOHNSTON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], in line 6, after the word "reserves," by striking out "either," and beginning in the same line, after the word "law," by striking out down to and including line 11 of the amendment, as follows:

Or in the securities enumerated in section 2 of this act, which shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That not more than one-third of the reserves required to be kept in the vaults of such associations shall be held in such securities.

Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say that, in my judgment, the bank reserves should be held in lawful money of the United States, and not in bond securities or the securities of grain-elevator receipts, or anything other than money. Upon that principle I voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]; and, in order to emphasize the question, I offer this amendment, and at the proper time I will ask the yeas and nays upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSTON, in line 6, after the word "reserves," it is proposed to strike out "either," and in the same line, after the word "law," to strike out the remainder of the amendment, as follows:

Or in the securities enumerated in section 2 of this act, which shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That not more than one-third of the reserves required to be kept in the vaults of such associations shall be held in such securities.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]—and which is the principle involved in his pending amendment to this bill—is absolutely impracticable. Its adoption would result in a greater disaster to this country than resulted from the late panic. It will not be voted for, I am sure, by any considerable number of Senators after it has been discussed by the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator will pardon me, I trust——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. The proposition now before the Senate—I beg to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. ALDRICH. I am aware of that fact. I understand the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. The proposition now before the Senate is not to keep the entire reserve at home, but to prevent the national banks from holding, in lieu of their reserves, bonds mentioned in section 2 of this act.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Texas perfectly, I think.

I was about to say, in addition to my criticism of the Senator's amendment which is now pending, that when it becomes obvious to the Senate—as I am sure it will sooner or later—that it is not possible to hold all reserves of the national banks of the United States in lawful money, you will be then confronted by the proposition of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], whether it is better to hold those reserves in the reserve and central reserve cities, or in a class of securities which are made by this act immediately exchangeable for cash.

Now, let us see what the practical operation of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama would be. Suppose we have any financial trouble in any part of the country. A bank under existing law must either keep its reserve in lawful money in its own vaults, or have it deposited in some national bank in a reserve or a central reserve city. I say it is impossible to require those banks to hold all their reserves in lawful money. That is a mathematical question which can be demonstrated beyond doubt. Is it better to allow the country banks of the United States to hold a portion of their reserves, which would be otherwise deposited in the cities of New York, Chicago, St. Louis, and the other reserve cities, or to have them hold a class of securities as reserves that are made immediately exchangeable for money? There can be no better class of reserves possible for a country bank, especially in time of trouble. In time of trouble the balance in New York, as has been shown by experience in such crises, is not available, and can not be made available. All that a bank holding these securities has to do is to go to the nearest subtreasury and it will, without delay and without notice, receive the cash for them.

I therefore think that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is not only correct, but that it is wise legislation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I regret very much that I can not agree with the proposed amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I agree with the amendment as drawn by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON]. It was very carefully drawn, in view of the actual amount of cash which the banks of this country have in hand. The amendment as proposed by the Senator from Alabama adds 2 per cent of the gross deposits of the country banks in cash to the holding of the reserves of the country banks, and using 4 per cent of these bonds will simply transfer credits, which now perhaps may be with the reserve agents, into the form of these securities, but will not require of them any more currency for that purpose. If more currency is required than there is in existence in these banks, obviously, to establish the relation, it would be necessary to contract the credits in a sum about four times as great as the additional amount of money that would be compelled to be put in these banks. It would therefore cause a dangerous constriction of credits and would emphasize the very panic from which we have just recovered. I think it would be a harmful amendment, and therefore feel obliged to oppose it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment to the amendment be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was again stated.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], and will vote. I vote "nay." I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]. I withhold my vote in his absence.

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. He is absent, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. An arrangement has been made whereby that pair is transferred to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Under the arrangement of pairs announced on the previous vote, whereby the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] will stand paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY]. Not knowing how he would vote on this matter, I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—4.

Clay	Culberson	Gore	Heyburn

So Mr. CULBERSON's amendment to the amendment of Mr. JOHNSTON was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it may be interesting before voting on that question to have our attention called to the wisdom of the legislature of the State of New York, as expressed yesterday upon this question. I will read the dispatch in this morning's New York Times, which is also found in other papers:

ALBANY, N. Y., March 26, 1908.

By a vote of 81 to 45, the assembly to-day passed the banking department's bill incerasing the reserve of State banks. The increase in the banks of the Borough of Manhattan is from 15 to 25 per cent, 15 per cent to be carried in vault and 10 per cent on deposit with a reserve agent. In other boroughs of New York the required reserve is 12½ per cent in vault and 12½ per cent on deposit with reserve agent.

In other parts of the State the required reserve is increased from 5 per cent to 6 per cent cash in vault and from 5 to 9 per cent on deposit with a reserve agent.

I do not intend to comment at any length upon this, but I thought it well to note that those of us who have favored the holding of the reserves in cash in the vaults of the banks, while we might not have much support in the Senate of the United States, yet that the great State of New York was not out of harmony with the views expressed by us and supported by our votes. If the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is correct that a policy of this kind would bankrupt the nation, then New York has set her foot toward the first march of demoralization and bankruptcy.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], in line 7, after the words "in the securities enumerated in section 2 of this act," I move to amend by inserting "or bank notes issued against such securities." I will say just a word, Mr. President, in reference to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSTON, in line 7, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert "or bank notes issued against such securities."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. du PONT. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be read again. I could not hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as I understand the present situation of this matter, the Finance Committee has accepted the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. That amendment provides that one-third of the reserves required to be kept in the vaults of the banks may be kept in the bonds described in this bill—that is, State, county, and municipal bonds. The theory upon which, as I understand, the committee agrees to accept, and, if the Senate adopts the amendment, the theory upon which the Senate will adopt that amendment, is that these bonds can be quickly converted into money—that is, into national-bank notes.

Under the present law, Mr. President, national-bank notes after they are issued can not be used as a part of the reserves of the banks. If these bonds are good as reserves—and that is what we declare if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Alabama—the money which may be issued against these bonds is equally good as reserves.

What would be the position of a bank holding these bonds as a part of its reserve in case the conditions of business required it to use those bonds for the purpose of getting money? It would come to the Treasury. The Treasury would issue it money upon the bonds, but after getting that money the bank would not, under the law, be permitted to use that money to supply the vacuum created by the withdrawal of the bonds from its reserve for the purpose of getting it. It seems to me, in that condition of things, that if these bonds are accepted for reserves then the money into which these bonds may be converted ought also to be accepted as a part of the reserve.

My proposition is not to make national-bank notes good for the whole amount of the reserves that a bank may hold, but to make them good for that part of the reserves represented by the bonds which we provide may be used as a part of the reserve of the bank.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. I move an amendment, at the end of the bill, as follows:

That no provision of law shall be construed to forbid any national bank to contract for the insurance of its deposits in any State wherein the laws of such State provide for the insurance of the deposits of State banks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following words:

That no provision of law shall be construed to forbid any national bank to contract for the insurance of its deposits in any State wherein the laws of such State provide for the insurance of the deposits of State banks.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the indulgence of the Senate just for a few moments. I had intended to offer an amendment proposing the insurance of bank deposits, because I believe—and the history relating to that subject justifies the belief—that it would have a powerful tendency to prevent the withdrawal of deposits by timid depositors, would prevent the hoarding of money, and therefore would prevent panics and would promote the stability of our commerce. Because of the opposition of the Committee on Finance to that opinion and because I do not believe the Senate is ready to adopt such a provision, I now make this suggestion, which would relate, so far as I know, only to the State of Oklahoma.

In that State they have a provision by which the State banks insure their deposits by a mutual arrangement through the officers of the State. A number of national banks in Oklahoma, where the rivalry was strong, have already given up their charters and taken out State charters, because they could not stand the opposition. In many cases it will make no difference with the banks, but a great many of the national banks of Oklahoma would like to provide an insurance for themselves on a mutual plan, and since it does not affect any other State, and since it goes to the protection of the national banks in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, I hope there will be found no objection on the part of the Senate to the proposed amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I should like to hear the amendment again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he thinks the amendment is necessary in order to enable the banks to do that?

Mr. OWEN. I think it is necessary under the possible view of the Comptroller of the Currency, who does not now think the law broad enough to justify it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NELSON obtained the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Minnesota desires to offer an amendment I will wait.

Mr. NELSON. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to be inserted as an independent section.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. —. That one-half of all taxes to be paid by national banking associations upon the average amount of their notes in circulation, pursuant to the provisions of section 4 of this act, shall be, and hereby is, set apart in the Treasury of the United States as a permanent special fund, termed "Depositors' fund," to be used and expended in paying all depositors, except the United States, the amount of their deposits in any such association that has become insolvent, and for which a receiver has been appointed; and whenever any such association has become insolvent and a receiver has been appointed therefor by the Comptroller of the Currency, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, as soon as practicable, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, pay all depositors of such association, except the United States, the amount of their then subsisting deposits out of and from the said special fund; and after making such payment the United States shall, as to such deposits, be subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the depositors, and shall be entitled to recover and receive from the assets of such association all dividends and the sums which the depositors would be entitled to if not paid from said special fund as aforesaid, and the amount so recovered and received shall be placed to the credit of and be a part of said special fund. Said special depositors' fund shall not be allowed to exceed the sum of $20,000,000, and all sums in excess of that amount shall be covered into the general funds of the Treasury.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into any extended discussion of this matter. I spoke upon it two weeks ago or so. I simply desire to call attention to the fact that a panic is distinguishable from a mere money stringency. A money stringency may arise because there is a temporary scarcity of currency, but whenever we have a panic such as we had last fall it always originates in a run by depositors on the banks, and last fall we had the spectacle of over $200,000,000 being withdrawn from the banks of New York within the space of less than ten days. As a result of that run and withdrawal, the banks, to protect themselves, practically closed their doors. In other words, they suspended cash payments for all practical purposes.

Now, the great volume of money that the banks have to dispose of and loan to their customers for purposes of trade and commerce is the money of their depositors. If you will look at the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, you will see that a large amount of the capital and surplus of the national banks is held in the shape of long-time securities—bonds of various kinds, national, State, municipal, and railroad bonds—so that their available money for loaning purposes is really the money of the depositors.

When a panic sets in and a run starts on the bank, money becomes scarce through two causes. First, because the depositors withdraw their money. In the next place, people who before that were content to get their pay in drafts and checks and credit currency are then anxious to have the cash.

On the one hand the supply of cash is depleted. On the other hand the demand for it increases.

Then there is another thing in connection with it, Mr. President. When a run is started on a bank by the depositors who withdraw their money, the bank, if it is a solvent bank and intends to keep open shop, has to call in its loans from its customers. It can not give any more accommodation. Men go to the bank to get accommodation, to get their commercial paper extended, and the bank says "We can not do it. We must have this money to meet the demands of depositors. They are making a run upon the bank. Therefore, we can not give you any more accommodation. You will have to pay your paper. We not only can not give you an extension, but we insist upon it that you pay your paper, because we need the cash to pay the calls of our depositors."

Now, if you can by legislation, as is proposed here, provide a fund for the protection of depositors, so that they will feel easy and confident and will not be affected by these panics, you, to a large extent, cure such evils as we had last fall. To my mind those evils arose from two sources. First, from a want of confidence on the part of depositors. In consequence of that there was a run on the banks, and in the next place because the banks themselves were even more cowardly than the depositors; because the big banks throughout the country practically suspended payment. That is the one way in which they stopped the panic. To my mind an emergency currency, such a is proposed in this bill, if the depositors get frightened and scared as they were last fall and institute a run, never would stop the panic. It might stop the hole in the New York Stock Exchange, but it would never stop the fright on the part of depositors.

The amendment does not levy any additional burden on the banks. It does not require them to pay an additional tax. It proposes to take one-half of the tax they now pay and set it apart as a fund for the benefit of depositors. The Federal Government does not guarantee the depositors. It simply provides a fund out of which they can be paid.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that the tax we to-day collect from the national banks on account of circulation is money that goes into the Treasury of the United States and belongs to the United States? Is it not true that we collect this tax by reason of the fact that we authorize these banks to issue money guaranteed by the United States; and is not the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota really an amendment providing that the United States shall guarantee to the depositors their money in the bank?

Mr. NELSON. No; it is not an absolute guaranty.

Mr. CLAY. Well, it is a guaranty against losses.

Mr. NELSON. It provides a fund out of which the deposits of the depositors are to be paid.

Mr. CLAY. It provides a fund out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. And that fund comes from the banks.

Mr. CLAY. It comes out of the Treasury. It is true the banks pay the taxes.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. But those taxes belong to the United States. They have belonged to the United States ever since we organized those banks. Does not the Senator think we would have just as much right to guarantee the payment of the debts of a merchant who failed or of a manufacturer who failed? Is it not a serious business when the United States undertakes to guarantee the payment of the debts of any individual or any corporation? When a depositor places his money in the bank, is it not true that the relation of debtor and creditor exists, and ought the Government to assume any liability in the premises? I have generally found the Senator from Minnesota correct, but I can not possibly agree with him in regard to his amendment. He is usually right, I am frank to confess, but I believe this would be a very serious undertaking.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Georgia takes a very narrow view of this question. To my mind the national banks are corporations created by the Federal Government. We have given them two functions. We have first clothed them with the function of issuing money, or what circulates as money. In other words, we have made them banks of issue. The Federal Government might have stopped with that, simply creating them banks of issue. In addition to that we have given them opportunities to carry on a general commercial business, to do what we call a discount and deposit business. Now, those banks are to that extent the agents of the Government. We have given them that power and authority; and independent of the law they could not exercise it. The right to carry on business as a corporation is not a constitutional right. The Federal Government and the State governments could absolutely refuse to create any corporation to carry on business, and no citizen would be in a position to say that he had been deprived of a constitutional right. Whenever a State government or the Federal Government creates a corporation to carry on certain public business, the creator of that corporation, the authority creating it, either State or Federal, has a right to prescribe the conditions and the terms upon which it shall do business. This is not a private business. The mistake the Senator makes is the mistake we heard years ago when we first attempted to regulate railroad transportation. The railroads got up on a lofty pinnacle and said to the American people: "We are private corporations. What right have you to regulate us? What right have you to say how we shall carry on our business? That is a matter between us and our stockholders." And yet when that question came before the courts, the courts decided, because the corporations were engaged in performing public service, created for that purpose, they were amenable and subject to public control.

The courts so decided even before the question about the railroads came up. In the case of Munn v. Illinois, the great elevator case, the court held that the men who were conducting the elevator business in the city of Chicago were performing a public function and a public service, and hence were amenable to public control.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. As I view the question it is not whether Congress has a constitutional right to require the banks to guarantee their deposits in the manner proposed by the amendment, but the real question is, Why should a man who has accumulated money and put it in a national bank be in a more favorable position than a man who loans money to a farmer or a merchant? If three men have $500 each, why should the man who deposits in the bank have the Government of the United States step in and say that that money shall be returned to him with proper interest, whereas the man who loans it to a merchant or a farmer does not get such a guaranty?

Mr. NELSON. We give such a guaranty. What are the bills of the national banks? They are simply promissory notes of the bank, and we provide that those obligations of the national banks shall be paid and protected. The only difference is that in the one case the debt of the bank is represented by a note—national-bank note. In the other case it is represented either by a certificate of deposit or by a bank book.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator from Minnesota will allow me for a moment, there is a wide difference between guaranteeing the notes that are issued by national banks and guaranteeing a depositor the return of his money. The issuing of the notes by the banks is made a part of the governmental machinery to furnish a currency to the country. It is made a part of the national business. These banks are simply fiscal agents of the Government in giving out this currency; to allow an amount sufficient to carry on the business of the country. Now, the position of the depositor is entirely different.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am willing to answer questions, but I do not like to have a man interject a speech into my speech.

Mr. HOPKINS. I want to suggest that a depositor is in voluntary position. He can go to the bank or not, as he chooses. I see no reason on principle why he should be protected by a guaranty.

Mr. NELSON. I can not, of course, help it that the Senator from Illinois takes such an obtuse and superficial view of this question. [Laughter.] I am not the keeper of his mind or his conscience. I can only state to the Senate how the question appears to me as a practical matter.

When we allow the national banks to organize and incorporate we hold them out to the public as a species of governmental agencies. They acquire a reputation and standing that other banks in the community scarcely have. It is all very well for the Senator from Illinois and others to say that the depositors ought to take their own risk. But to the ordinary small depositor—the laboring man, the farmer—a bank is a bank, and he is not able to find out and he can not tell whether a bank is a first-class, a sound bank or not. It is sufficient to him to know that it is a Government institution, organized under Federal law, and he deposits his money.

Senators, you may think I am cranky about this subject, but I had a little experience in my younger days, the memory of which has been with me ever since. When I was a law student in the city of Madison, Wis., in 1867, I was very poor, but I finally succeeded in accumulating the great fund of $500. It was practically all of my possessions. There was in the city of Madison a bank known as a "farmers' bank." I did not know the difference. I supposed one bank was as good as another. I deposited my little money in that bank. In a very short time the bank failed.

I did not have at that time the skill and judgment that the Senator from Illinois has. What dwelt in my mind was that the bank was a bank, and if I deposited my money in any bank in the city of Madison I would be perfectly safe. But I unfortunately had deposited in a very poor bank, which within a very short time utterly failed, and I lost everything I had with the exception of an old balky horse and an old cow. [Laughter.] If I had had the Senator from Illinois at my side at that time, perhaps he might have cautioned me. But the trouble is that the rank and file of depositors in this country, the laborers and farmers of this country, have not these wise statesmen at their shoulders to nudge them and say, "This is a good bank and that is a bad bank."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I rose to ask the Senator from Minnesota to explain a point in which I am very much interested, as other Senators I know are, but before I ask him that question, with his permission, I want to say that I do not think any person is going to believe that making the depositors of this country, both small and great, secure in their savings would reduce this to a nation of slaves. I do not think that that is very convincing.

Mr. NELSON. It was a matter of hyperbole.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes. I want to say further, before I ask the question, that I think the Senator from Minnesota has stated an undeniable truth. I was once the attorney for a bank that failed. It had had a great many hundreds of depositors, both large and small. The present occupant of the chair [the Vice-President] knows about that fact. It had a high reputation. The banks that fail not only deceive the depositors, but they deceive even the Government examiners. It is not by the exercise of any vigilance, of which we have heard so much spoken here, that depositors can determine whether a bank is sound or not. Suppose the Knickerbocker Trust Company had been a national bank. It had upward of $70,000,000 of deposits. Not only did it have a great mass of stockholders, but it had some very heavy stockholders and very rich men and some financiers among the number. Yet they were deceived. So the argument that this is going to put a premium on negligence is not tenable. I am with the Senator from Minnesota on that. That is a plainly undeniable fact.

I wish to ask the Senator a question. It is the point made the other day by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], which, up to this time, has convinced me against the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota, which otherwise I would sympathize with, and that is this: The Senator showed by the annual failures and the amount due from the banks to their depositors that the sum was so great that no provision could be made to accumulate a fund that would at all handle the situation. Does the Senator from Minnesota remember the point made by the Senator from Montana the other day in presenting those figures?

Mr. NELSON. I remember it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The question I ask, and I ask it, as the Senator knows, with entire sympathy with his purpose, is, By what means can a sufficient fund be accumulated to meet the immense liabilities that are caused by the failure of these banks? The Senator from Montana, if his figures were correct the other day, by his figures showed that this tax, which was designed to gather in this security fund, was totally inadequate. That is the question I wish to hear the Senator upon when he gets to it. I do not want to interrupt the thread of his argument.

Mr. NELSON. Of course, taking the record as disclosed by the Comptroller of the Currency in his last annual report, and I think in preceding reports, if I recall the figures correctly, for all of the banks that have failed and suspended, become insolvent since the system was organized up to within two years ago, I think, the average amount of losses on the total amount of deposits in those banks was equal to five-hundredths of 1 per cent. Of course if you stop panics there will be little drain on this fund. Taking the circulation that we had about a month ago, which, if I remember aright, was $690,000,000——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator will excuse me right here. If you stop panics there will be no need for the fund, or not very much, at least.

Mr. NELSON. That is the object of the fund.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And this fund is designed to afford security to depositors in just exactly the emergency of a panic, is it not?

Mr. NELSON. The object of this fund is to stop panics. The circulation of the national banks about a month ago—I do not know what it is to-day—I think was $690,000,000, and upon that basis the total amount of the taxes that would come in under this bill—and this bill does not change the law in respect to that matter—on a circulation of $690,000,000 would be $3,540,000 a year. There is a tax of a half per cent on circulation issued under the 2 per cent bonds and a tax of 1 per cent on bonds of the higher grade. The total amount that would come in outside of the tax on this emergency currency would be $3,540,000 a year. One-half of this amount would be $1,770,000.

In the first instance, my amendment provided that the fund should not exceed $10,000,000. This makes the fund $20,000,000. In the amendment as I have offered it to-day I have changed the amount from one-third to one-half of the tax. I would apply in this respect the same argument that the Senator from Rhode Island has applied to the emergency currency when, if I remember correctly, he stated that the effect of this emergency currency would be that the mere knowledge of the fact that there was authority to issue such currency would tend to stop a panic. I would say the same about this matter of protecting depositors. The mere fact that there is a fund in the Treasury for their protection will tend to allay distrust and to restore confidence and leave the money in the banks. The banks showed to what extremes they could resort in the recent panic.

The big banks suspended payment pretty much all over the country, leading to the suspension of the smaller banks in some instances. That is one way of stopping a panic, but it is a very lawless way. To my mind the honest way, the legitimate way, is to remove all causes for distrust among the people. If you protect the depositors of banks and they are as confident about their deposits as they are about their bills, there will be no occasion for runs upon our banks. People will take out only what money they need for their current use.

Since I first introduced my amendment and made some remarks, a while ago, I have received a great many letters, not only from farmers and business men throughout the Northwest, but I have received a great many letters from national banks of the smaller class. Of course the great argument of the big banks is that "You put us on a level with the little banks; you make them stand before the depositors with as good credit as we do, and that is not fair. We want the deposits, and we want these little banks to shift for themselves." But it ought not to lie in the mouths of the big banks to take that stand, because the big banks that are now claiming that they are so good that it will be unjust to discriminate against them were in the recent panic the most lawless of all banks. They suspended payment and began to hoard money.

Of the many letters I have received on this subject, I ask the Secretary to read a letter that I received from the president of a national bank in Wisconsin—the McCartney National Bank, of Green Bay, Wis.; capital, $100,000; surplus, $50,000. I think there is a good deal of sense in the letter, and I ask to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE MCCARTNEY NATIONAL BANK,
Green Bay, Wis., March 9, 1908.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In the public press I have seen references made to a currency bill submitted by you to the present Congress. This subject-matter seems to be of paramount interest to the whole country at present. There seems to be no other issue that so directly and effectually reaches to the foundation of all the interests of this country, both as regards the present and the future stability and uniformity of our business. As a matter of course, all business men of this country are giving considerable thought to the different measures proposed for correction of the deficiency existing in our present money system, and to my mind I can not see any measure that would give such quick and lasting results as the guaranty to depositors by the United States Government of the payment of all deposits made in national banks. Such a measure, in itself, is a natural remedy for all panics and financial difficulties.

If all deposits in national banks were guaranteed by the Government, enough money would be restored to general circulation that is now hoarded and hid away to make sufficient currency for all legitimate business requirements, and I feel sure this would equal an amount much greater than the limit reached by the Aldrich bill and be far more effectual.

Under our present system the business of the country is very unstable and often finds itself in a precarious condition. As has been proved in the past, it does not take very much cause to alarm the depositors, resulting in runs on the banks. The banks' only relief in such emergencies is to call, at least in part, loans made to manufacturers and other business interests, often resulting in disaster to such men and their business interests, obliging them to curtail their business and raise money to pay loans at a time when money is almost impossible to get, and which they should not be called upon to do if they were perfectly good financially under ordinary conditions. The cause for the calling of such loans would be entirely removed if the Government guaranteed all deposits in the national banks. As then, to begin with, no depositor would feel timid, and they would not want their money if they knew it was perfectly safe and guaranteed by the United States Government. Again, the banks would not be obliged to call on their customers at the very time when they most need financial assistance, so that in many ways it would insure a business stability such as we have never enjoyed under the present banking system.

All the expense connected with any such guaranty and the losses occasioned by any national bank becoming insolvent could be entirely covered by a general assessment on all national banks, creating a sinking fund abundantly ample to take care of all expenses and losses based upon the statistics of all national banks doing business since they were first organized up to the present time, and I know the banks as a rule would be very glad to pay such an assessment, for it would be very insignificant as compared to the advantages gained for the banks.

I am aware that some bankers doing business in the large money centers of this country claim that the guaranty by the Government of deposits in all national banks would lead to reckless banking. I do not think that their position is well taken. I grant that their condition is a little different from those generally termed country banks, in this respect—that in most country banks the officers and directors own most of the stock and therefore have a personal reason for protecting the best interests of the bank, while in the case of a great many large city banks they are operated largely by professional bankers, the operating of these banks having become a profession, and the parties managing these banks very often do not hold any large amount of stock.

The danger to the depositors that has existed in the past and will exist in the future, it seems to me, is all the more reason why there should be protection afforded the helpless depositor who has invested his small savings.

The Federal law is such now that it is mighty poor business for any officer of a bank to do a crooked business. They generally get caught and are severely punished; besides, additional safeguards could be put in effect, giving additional protection to national banks. For instance, under our present system a national bank examiner comes around to examine each national bank twice a year; he takes a careful account of all their assets, including cash and bills receivable, also their deposits and other items; he finds these to be correct, but can not say as to whether all the signatures to the bills receivable are bona fide nor as to the financial standing of the makers of these papers. If the inspection force was doubled, charging the cost of same to the banks, the inspectors would then have time to verify, to a large extent at least, the value of all the bills receivable of any considerable amount. This, it seems to me, would double the safeguards over the system as now applied to national banks, as most of our bank failures are due to this lack of supervision of the bills receivable.

Again, what is known as country banks, which comprise, I believe, a large part of the banking interests of this country and take care of the greater part of the business interests of this country and who are therefore entitled to be heard, are practically never consulted when Congress is looking for information or advice. They simply go to a few of the bankers in the large cities and advise with them.

It seems strange, looking back over the past, that the subject of the expansion of our currency system has not received more attention, as it undoubtedly has had much to do with every panic this country has passed through. It was not until our recent flurry of last fall that we fully realized that our present currency system was largely to blame for our panics. We had good crops, with good prices; we had all our people working and getting good wages, and no large surplus or overstock in any manufacturing line. When we realize that through our present system several billion dollars are locked up in the National Treasury and national banks throughout the country, no part of which is available for business purposes, it is no wonder we are short of money to do the country's business, which business is constantly increasing and expanding every year.

I would like to say more, but do not want to burden you with an already too long letter. Thanking you for your personal and official interest in a bill calculated to give a greater stability to all our business interest, I am,

Very truly, yours, WM. LARSEN.

Mr. McCUMBER. Inasmuch as I am informed that the bankers' association of my State have resolved in favor of a measure having for its purpose the guaranteeing of depositors, but of a different character, and that measure, which is known as the Gronna bill in the House, I have introduced as an amendment to this bill in the Senate. It differs somewhat from the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, and I should like to have the Senator from Minnesota, if he will do so, explain in detail as to what extent the individual depositors would be protected by the particular fund which he says would be the fund that would stand for their protection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, of course the amendment does not go into details. The method of procedure will have to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. I presume that when a national bank fails and is put into the hands of a receiver the usual course will be taken; that is, the depositors of the bank will have to present their claims to the receiver, and they will have to be passed upon by him. After the claims have been passed upon and determined, then the Secretary of the Treasury can proceed to pay them. This simply provides the fund, but the machinery, the method of procedure, will be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McCUMBER. Out of the fund as now provided by law?

Mr. NELSON. Out of this depositors' fund.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator please explain, so as to have it upon the record, what he understands by the depositors' fund?

Mr. NELSON. The Senator perhaps was not in when I explained it.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I was not.

Mr. NELSON. I shall, therefore, have to repeat it. It proposes to set aside one-half of all the taxes that the national banks are required to pay under existing law on the ordinary currency and also on the emergency currency. It sets aside one-half of it and allows the fund to accumulate up to $20,000,000 to pay them out of that fund.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just to get the information, will the Senator state the purpose for which the tax is now levied?

Mr. NELSON. I presume the justification for the tax upon the national banks is for the privilege of doing business as national banks. We make these banks pay that tax for the privilege of doing that business, just in the same way that we make the brewers and the manufacturers of distilled spirits and wholesale and retail dealers in liquor pay a tax; that is, we charge them that much for the privilege of carrying on the business of a bank of issue and a bank of commerce.

Mr. McCUMBER. And this tax, if I may interrupt the Senator, is covered into the Treasury?

Mr. NELSON. This tax goes into the Treasury.

Mr. McCUMBER. And is not utilized for any specific purpose?

Mr. NELSON. At present not. It goes into the general fund of the Treasury. The amendment proposes to set aside one-half of it as a special fund to be devoted to that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. What would be the amount that would be realized from one-half of the fund yearly?

Mr. NELSON. I have figured it out here. When I prepared the data for the remarks that I made some time ago I took the circulation that was then outstanding. I think it is a little less now. Some of it has been withdrawn since that time; I do not remember just how much. At that time the circulation outstanding was $690,000,000, and of that amount $672,000,000 were based on the 2 per cent Panama and other 2 per cent bonds. The tax on the circulation based on those bonds is one-half of 1 per cent a year. The tax on circulation, based on bonds of a higher interest-bearing quality, is 1 per cent a year. Upon that basis the total amount of the tax the banks pay would be $3,540,000 a year.

That does not take into account the emergency currency. In case emergency currency should be issued it would be 6 per cent a year upon the $500,000,000 that would be added. These figures are based upon the present system of circulation that we have. The emergency currency, if issued, will add a great deal to the fund.

One-half of this amount—that is, of the $3,540,000—would be $1,770,000 a year, and the fund is to be allowed to accumulate until it reaches the sum of $20,000,000. Every time a bank goes into insolvency the depositors are paid out of this fund. The Federal Government is subrogated; it steps into the shoes of the depositors who are thus paid and gets whatever it can get out of the assets of the bank, and that goes into this fund.

So, if in any case a national bank fails or suspends and there are depositors to pay, the Government in the first instance pays those depositors. Then the Government steps into the shoes of the depositors, and out of the assets of the bank realizes the dividends or whatever might be coming to the depositors, and the money that is thus realized by the Government goes back into the fund to increase it.

I do not know that there is anything more I have to say. I have gone into this question before and I am unwilling to take up the time of the Senate in needless discussion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I send to the desk the amendment which I have offered to the pending bill, and I ask that it may be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 4:

That each and every national bank created, organized, and existing under and by virtue of the banking laws of the United States shall annually pay to the Comptroller of the Currency a charge of one-fiftieth of 1 per cent of the average annual amount of its deposits, for the purpose of creating a special fund to be held by the Treasurer of the United States and to be used and paid out by the Comptroller of the Currency for the purposes and as hereinafter specified and set forth in this act: Provided, That whenever, in the judgment of the Comptroller of the Currency, the said fund shall be sufficient to answer the purposes herein provided for he shall, upon reasonable notice to each of said banks, suspend the further payment of said charge.

That immediately upon the passage of this act the Comptroller of the Currency shall notify all national banks existing and doing business under the banking laws of the United States of this act, with notice that they shall within thirty days therefrom pay to the Comptroller of the Currency the amount of one-fiftieth of 1 per cent of their average annual deposits, as determined from the five reports made to the Comptroller of the Currency for the previous year. That if the officers of any national bank willfully neglect or refuse to comply with any or all of the provisions of this act, such failure or refusal shall be deemed a sufficient cause for the forfeiture of the charter of such bank, and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to cause proceedings to be instituted for such forfeiture.

That when any national bank, as mentioned in this act, shall hereafter have become insolvent, and after full liquidation and settlement its depositors shall not have been paid in full, the amount found to be due each and every depositor after such liquidation and settlement shall be paid by the Comptroller out of the fund created under and by virtue of this act.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this amendment differs from the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] in effect only in creating a special fund that shall be utilized for this purpose. The fund out of which the Senator from Minnesota desires to pay the depositors is a fund already provided by law, or at least it is a taxation already provided by law and is a part of the income of the Government itself. This provides for a charge. I will not call it a tax, because it is for the purpose of regulation rather than for the purpose of an income. It provides for a charge of one-fiftieth of 1 per cent of the average amount of deposits in all the banks during any one year, or so much thereof as may be necessary to meet the demands for losses by depositors.

Under the provisions of this amendment, if a bank went into insolvency, before the fund would be drawn upon in any way the assets of the bank would be exhausted and payments made as they are made to-day. If there was then any deficiency, the amount necessary to pay that deficiency to cover the losses of the depositors would be paid out of this special fund.

I am willing to support this provision, or I am willing to support the one that has been proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. The objections that would be laid against the one would be equally forcible against the other. So I do not know that I care about taking a separate vote upon this proposition as contradistinguished from that of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

This matter has already been discussed at considerable length, and I can only add a word or two to what has already been said. The losses annually, as I showed in a previous discussion on this subject, through bank failures from 1865 to 1903, when we, perhaps, had more panics and greater losses than we will ever have again in the history of the country, averaged about $851,000 per year. Taking the amount of annual deposits during those years, an average of one-sixtieth of 1 per cent would have paid all the losses of the depositors.

Mr. President, every Senator understands that to be a mere bagatelle and scarcely to be taken into consideration in the conduct of the banking business of the United States. The slight payment of this sum, which would never be felt by the banks themselves, would insure the country against any possible run, in my candid judgment, upon the banks, and instead of a requirement of one-fiftieth or one-sixtieth of 1 per cent I do not believe that it would require a charge or taxation that would be one-hundredth of 1 per cent. So the very fact of the knowledge of the depositor that he would ultimately be protected in his deposit would be such, in my judgment, as to prevent any run upon the bank.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator was speaking about a depositor placing his money in the bank. The statistics show that the amount of deposits in various national and State banks aggregate twelve billion nine hundred and thirty-three million and some odd hundred thousand dollars.

We have, as a matter of fact, only about three billion of money in this country, taking all of the money that there is. So these figures show that there are more than $900,000,000 of credit represented in bank deposits. Now, does the Senator say that these credits should be guaranteed as well as money that is actually put in the bank?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the credits, of course, are equivalent to deposits. They amount to deposits. We can not separate what the Senator calls credits from deposits. The bank books will show a credit or a deposit of about four times the amount of money there is in the United States. We can not separate the credits from the deposits. I intend to guarantee all of them. Any bill that will guarantee deposits must necessarily guarantee the checks or credits or whatever are accepted as deposits which represent money and which are a demand for money. So there can be no question about that.

But what does that argue? Does it mean that we are endangered in any way because of the excessive amount of these deposits over and above the amount of money in the United States to pay them? Mr. President, if every depositor to-day would call for his money in the banks there would not be enough money in the whole United States to pay one-fourth of the amount of the deposits. Every bank would be broken. But we all understand that business is not done on that line. We all understand that in a country with eighty or ninety million inhabitants there is not going to be a run upon every bank in the United States at the same time. In my opinion, as I have stated, and it has been supplemented and strengthened by the opinion of the Senator from Minnesota, whenever the depositors comprehend the facts that their deposits will be ultimately paid, such a law as that would in effect operate to stop all runs upon banks. I do not say that it would be impossible not to have a run, but I believe, as a rule, that we could say, except in very grave cases, there would be no runs upon the banks.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me ask the Senator what would be the effect upon State banks if this bill should become a law? Would not every State bank necessarily become a national bank? It was stated on the floor by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] that under a separate State law in his State all the national banks practically became State banks.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated, in discussing this matter before, that it would either force the States to pass a law for the guarantee of deposits in the State banks or else it would force the State banks to nationalize.

Mr. OWEN rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it would be beneficial if it would force every State bank to nationalize, so that we would have but one character of banks in the United States outside of savings banks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. OWEN. I simply want to correct a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from North Carolina that I had suggested that all the national banks had become State banks. That is only true in certain special cases, where the competition was severe and where the State bank across the street could say that its depositors were guaranteed, while the national bank, which was its rival, could not make that assertion. In some cases it frightened the small national banker and he gave up his charter and it became a State bank.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am aware that the Senate of the United States is an exceedingly conservative body. It moves very slowly. It is very careful about taking any very great advanced steps. All its steps are very short and looking only a short way ahead.

But, Mr. President, since I have been here I have known bills to come before the Senate which could not receive the consideration at all of more than two or three Senators. I have seen them agitated year in and year out for three or four years, when there were not more than two or three Senators voting against them, where they represented a great national step, and in every instance where I have noted these changes I have not noted any very bad results. I can give as an example the pure-food law, which could not for a period of nearly five years get before the Senate even to be heard or to be amended or voted on, and I saw finally, when it was voted upon, there were, as I believe, only three Senators in the entire body who voted against it. I could cite other cases of that kind.

Mr. President, we are drifting toward this great end of protecting the depositors——

Mr. HOPKINS rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one second—of protecting them against losses. We have a recommendation already before the Senate providing for deposits in our post-offices and then compelling the Government to loan the funds in order to protect the depositors and keep the money in circulation. It is said to us that especially the foreign laborers who come here and desire to put their money in the banks are afraid of the banks, that they will carry it around with them, and that if we will pass a law whereby they can deposit their money in post-offices, receive credit for it, and draw interest at the rate of 2 per cent, then we shall keep all the money in circulation.

I confess that I am not converted to that doctrine, though I may be, provided the proposition is carefully guarded and limited. I do not believe that the Government of the United States should make of itself a loaning agency to loan the money of the people out and then to pay them interest, which is the operation practically of this new suggestion. Yet the people are agitating that subject; we are drifting in that direction; and I shall not be surprised if within the next two or three or four years we shall have a bill of that kind before Congress and vote on it favorably, and thus protect the people in their deposits.

I think this is a much more simple and a really better method of keeping the money in circulation, protecting the people in their deposits, and giving them confidence that the banks will protect them and that the Government will protect the banks.

Mr. President, the only objection I have heard against this system that seems to me worthy of serious consideration is the objection that it is placing a premium upon the carelessness of certain banks; that the good banks that will look to their own character of doing business and to the reputation which they have honestly earned to secure for them depositors will fare no better than other banks. I admit that there is something in that proposition; but, Mr. President, if we should have a banking law of this kind, the result would be that every bank in the community would watch carefully every other bank and compel it to do business just as carefully as it does.

It would call the attention of the bank examiner to any laches on the part of the smaller banks or the inferior banks in conducting their business or in their failure to comply with the national banking law. That being the case, and we seeking by every possible effort to keep the money of the country in circulation, if we will take this simple device, we shall have accomplished something that will render absolutely nugatory and unnecessary all the balance of this bill, because it will reach the very subject that this bill is intended to reach, and that is to allay the fear on the part of the depositor that he will not be able to get his money out of the bank. When you have allayed that fear, then you will not be under the necessity of adopting a system which in its nature every man must admit to be more or less injurious to the credit of the country—an emergency currency that shall expand and dilute and make worthless every dollar in the United States for a given length of time, and which we are compelled to admit will invite the very thing that has brought about, to a great extent at least, the serious difficulties which we were in during the last few months, and that is speculation.

If the people of the United States with speculative tendencies understand that when they carry those tendencies to the extreme limit of the exhaustion of the money of the country they can immediately expand the currency another $500,000,000, what have we got to guarantee us that the same speculative spirit will not lead them to an extent that will exhaust the other extra $500,000,000?

If we could guarantee, I repeat, that every man who places his money in a national bank would receive it again, dollar for dollar, we should never meet, in my candid opinion, the exigency against which the Aldrich bill is directed.

I am in favor of the Aldrich bill because I believe that the country is demanding it and because I believe, if we do not change our system, we shall be liable to reach a condition in which it will be seriously demanded again of the Government that it protect the people. That is the only reason in the world why I could give it support. But I hope, Mr. President, that we shall sooner or later reach the conclusion that we had far better guarantee the depositors directly than to guarantee them indirectly by receiving their money into the post-offices, then loaning it to the banks again, and charging interest to the banks, we collecting that interest and paying it over to the people.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I had not intended to make any remarks on this amendment, as I felt that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] had fully covered the case, but that Senator prefers that I make a statement of my position on this proposed amendment, and I shall therefore detain the Senate but a few moments.

There seems to be an impression in the minds of some that this amendment partakes of governmental paternalism, and for that reason they oppose the amendment. If I thought for a moment, Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope that before the Senator gets through with his discourse, as he is a practical man, he will tell us what the practical effect of this amendment would have been if it had been in operation for the last three months.

Mr. PILES. Well, I may not be able to do that, Mr. President, because we had no fund to operate upon during the last three months; but I was going to say if I felt that this amendment smacked of governmental paternalism I should oppose it, because I do not believe there is any man in this Chamber who believes more thoroughly in individualism than I do. I believe that every man should be made to fight his own way in the world, and if I believed that the Government was going to step behind an individual depositor for the mere purpose of protecting him I should not for a moment support this amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Washington allow me to make a suggestion to him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will state what I understand would have been the practical operation of this amendment if it had been in effect for the past three months, and I shall be glad to have the Senator from Washington state wherein I am in error, if I am in error.

The amendment provides for a fund which, according to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], would amount to $1,700,000. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the depositors of failed banks the amount of their deposits. If it had been in effect during the last three months, the Secretary of the Treasury would have had a fund of $1,700,000 with which to pay $33,000,000 to depositors of failed banks. It would take twenty years at least for a fund to have even accumulated sufficient to have paid the deposits of those banks, to say nothing about those banks that might fail at a later date. I should be glad to know in what way the deficiency would be provided for.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, there are two ways of looking at the proposition. I see the Senator from Rhode Island does not agree with my view at all.

In the first place, if we had had this fund, in my judgment, we would not have had the October panic, because there was no sound reason for that panic. One reason why I am supporting the Senators' bill is because I believe if the people of this country who have money in banks understand that when they make a run upon a bank, that that bank may meet that run by an issue of emergency currency, that in itself will have a very strong tendency toward suppressing panics in this country and runs on banks.

Believing that panics should be stopped and that it is the duty of the Government, so far as it can in the exercise of its lawmaking powers to do all it can lawfully do to prevent panics, I believe that if this fund shall be created the people who put their money in banks will not make runs on the banks, except in very rare cases.

We want to keep all the money we have in the country in circulation. Just the moment that a panic is whispered throughout any section of the country, some one immediately commences to draw his money out of the bank, and when one commences another follows, and so in a little while runs are made upon the banks, and in the end the whole country is thrown into a panic.

Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota is not a guaranty upon the part of the Government to pay the money deposited by an individual depositor in a bank. To my mind, this Government made a great mistake when it enacted the national banking law by not then providing that the banks should pay a tax upon their circulating notes, as they now do, and that the money derived therefrom should be set aside as a fund to protect depositors in the national banks. National banks are, in a sense, agencies of the Government. The Government guarantees the payment of every dollar that the banks put in circulation, and it takes security from the banks for the purpose of protecting itself on the guaranty which it makes to the note holder. If the Government had required the banks to pay a tax for the purpose set forth in the Senator's amendment when the banking system was first started, no one would have ever thought about the question of paternalism in connection with the precaution thereby taken by the Government for the protection of bank depositors.

But, Mr. President, it was said that this amendment is solely for the purpose of protecting the bank depositors. I think this a mistaken view. The amendment, as I view it, is for the protection of all the people. There are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who never deposit a dollar in a national bank who are vitally interested in the success of those who have their money deposited in such banks. Numerous industrial establishments have on various occasions been compelled to shut down and throw thousands of men out of employment by reason of bank failures. The loss, for instance, of a great manufacturer of his money in a bank failure does not affect him alone; it affects the thousands in his employ, and through them frequently a whole community, reaching, as it often does, into more than one State in the Union.

But I do not care to take up the time of the Senate at the present in further discussing this amendment. I believe the day is coming when the people of the country will realize that panics may be largely averted by taking such steps as will prevent bank failures, and that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota is cast upon correct lines.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, there are two ways to prevent damage by fire. One is to have an abundant water supply after a building capable of combustion is on fire, and the other way is to have the building itself fireproof. The real cause of a panic is the withdrawal of money by the depositor for hoarding. That is the real cause of a panic. The preliminary which leads to that fear I do not care to debate if the fear itself can be thoroughly removed by an adequate plan.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is no novelty in the principle of insurance for depositors, even in our own country. The principle has already been written into our laws. There are already in our laws two great bulwarks for the protection of depositors. The first protection is the money of the banker invested, which must stand the first strain of loss before the depositor will suffer. There is a second bulwark to protect the depositor, and that is the double liability of the stockholder, which amounts in this banking system of ours to $800,000,000. It is abundant, with the exception of about $85,000 of average annual loss during the last nine years.

The statistics show, as given in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency sent to the Senate, that the losses to depositors during the last nine years have only been $85,000 a year, and only about $700,000 a year since the foundation of this system. Therefore the fund of $1,750,000 a year proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is nearly three times as much as the losses during the life of the system and is thirty-odd times as much as the loss during the last nine years.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is answering the question that I put to the Senator from Minnesota. The purpose of this fund, as I understand, is that the depositors shall be immediately paid. The double liability of stockholders which the Senator speaks of and the assets of the bank, which are liable to the depositors, can be realized upon only after a considerable time. So the fund provided for by the amendment and that liability do not dovetail into each other. I understood the purpose of the creation of this fund was to meet the immediate demands of depositors, otherwise the Senator's explanation would be perfect. The fund would be adequate, but in view of the fact that the liability can not be realized on for a long time, and the depositors want their money right now, and the purpose of this fund being to pay it right now, the fund would not, to my mind, seem to be adequate. That is the only objection that I can see to this amendment.

Mr. OWEN. I will endeavor to satisfy the Senator from Indiana, and will call his attention to the fact that if such a provision had been in operation since the last panic we would have had nearly $30,000,000 on hand, or certainly a very large amount—I have not the precise figures before me—but it would be over $20,000,000, I take it. But the important point is that this fund would not be required except in the case of insolvencies brought about by the fear of the depositor, and when you remove the fear of the depositor he does not start runs upon the banks. Since this fund is accumulative and since, even in our country, where we have had no protection against panics, these periodic disturbances have not exceeded one in ten or twelve years, the accumulative effect of this would be that before another panic would take place, under normal conditions, there would be an accumulation sufficient to abundantly meet its demands. The proviso which I suggested proposed to use all of the funds paid in on account of the tax on circulation, which amounts to $3,000,000 a year, because it is better to have an abundant fund than to have one about which there could be the slightest question; and since that matter, if it is open to doubt, can be readily corrected by using a larger part of this fund for circulation, the Senator's amendment could be corrected by using all of that fund. In that way there would be provided a fund sufficient to absolutely protect the depositor against fear. When that shall have been done, we have a fireproof building.

Emergency currency is to remedy the matter after the panic occurs; and inasmuch as the remedy will be availing after the panic occurs, it has also a preventive force, because when men know that they can get currency under certain conditions they will not be afraid of not getting currency. Both the emergency circulation and the insurance of deposits act in the same way, to prevent the fear of the people, which, after all, is the soul of a panic.

The Senator from Rhode Island asks what would have been the effect of such a provision if it had been in force during the last three months. I say that if this provision had been on our statute books, and if the bill which the Senator from Rhode Island has brought in had been on our statute books, there would have been no panic last October. The real cause of the panic was the withdrawal for hoarding. That amounted, not to $200,000,000, not to $400,000,000, but it amounted to a much larger sum, which was not made good even by the $220,000,000 deposited by the Government from the Treasury, but required clearing-house certificates from one end of this country to the other, the total amount of which, as I have shown here, being over a thousand millions of artificial money put into use in this country during the last panic.

I call your attention to another very important thing. When you give security to the depositor he will then take out of hoarding a large volume of currency which now is locked up and is not available to our commerce. There are hundreds and thousands of people who do not propose to trust their little earnings, as the Senator from Minnesota did his $500, to any bank whatever. They keep it at home locked up in their trunks, locked up in strong boxes; but if we were to provide this security for the depositor, we would then have withdrawn from hoarding a vast volume of money. I think it would amount to five or six hundred million dollars, which would be added to the funds of this country available for our commerce, and we would get over the paralysis which has fallen upon our business. Men would again feel the sense of security that it is necessary for a man to feel before he will invest his money in any enterprise whatever. The trouble with men in these enterprises is that they fear the unexpected constriction of credit that will ruin any business man in any enterprise if it comes upon him unexpectedly. Take the great enterprise of Westinghouse, built upon a magnificent foundation, about which no question could arise. And yet the constriction of credit coming suddenly upon that enterprise, which is a great creditor and a great debtor as well, and since in our country every man who is in business is both a debtor and a creditor——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that possibly it might have been the unwise expansion of credit of the concern he has just mentioned instead of the contraction of credit that brought it to the situation which he describes.

Mr. OWEN. They were not in any trouble until the hoarding of money began, and when that hoarding took place and the panic was on, then their expansion of credit, both the credits they extended and the credits they had previously received, caused them to suffer, because they then could not collect from their debtors and their creditors pressed them severely for settlement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but if the Senator will permit me, the fact is that just such concerns as the Senator from Oklahoma has referred to put their notes upon every banking counter. I doubt not in the Senator's bank in Oklahoma the notes of this concern were offered. They got beyond their capital. They tested their credit to the limit and were caught in the gale with all their sails out. While they will undoubtedly recover, it is possibly the fault of our system that the expansion was so general.

Mr. OWEN. I will agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan that any man who extends his credit beyond a sound basis will necessarily reach his personal liquidation. That will follow as the law of gravity. But it will not do to say that the enterprises in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, were on an unsound basis. They were moving along with perfect serenity and without any disturbance whatever until this sudden hoarding of deposits took place, the employment of lock boxes all over the country began, and the panic was on. Then, of course, they suffered.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. There having been a reference made by the Senator from Oklahoma to the Westinghouse concern, I should like to say to him, because I think I know what I am speaking about, that those institutions were not upon an unsound basis; that their credits were not improperly expanded. The difficulty simply was that they were doing more business than they had capital to do. There were such enormous demands for their output, even at profitable prices, that they could not expand their operations to meet them without more capital.

My own judgment is—I state it with some hesitation, because you are talking about a very large subject when you talk about the cause of the panic—that the fundamental cause of the last panic was that this country was doing more business than it had either men, means, or machinery to conduct; and some one's particular want of capital, as, for instance, the Westinghouse concern, brought us to a sudden realization of that fact, and an inspection of the situation developed that it was general, and that was the reason of the panic.

Mr. OWEN. Until the lock boxes became popular there was no affliction in this country in the way of lack of capital; but when the hoarding went to the extent of four or five or six hundred millions and the money went out of sight, and what is more important—and I call the attention of the Senator to it—when that fear swept over the country, it resulted in the constriction of an ephemeral currency which we have in this country amounting to about three thousand millions—checks and drafts. If you will examine the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1884 and 1893, you will find that the exchanges diminished one-half. Those checks and drafts in normal times serve the purpose; and with that shrinkage and with this hoarding of money by the frightened depositors they did indeed need the capital and lacked the capital necessary to carry on a safe and stable business.

Now, I want to call attention to one other item with regard to this matter, and that is the statement that this would give a premium on bad banking. By bad banking is meant either wasteful, extravagant, or dishonest banking. Criminal banking is controlled by a criminal code. Extravagant banking is controlled by the interests of the banker who has his fortune invested in the bank and which must suffer loss before the depositor suffers. Therefore that argument is one which goes at right angles to self-interest, which after all is the great control of business men.

It has been suggested that perhaps individualism would be destroyed by insuring these deposits, but I call attention to the fact that the individual banker goes into the banking business and invests his money in the banking business for the purpose of making money, for the purpose of protecting his family and taking care of his fortune. He is not going to be neglectful of his own welfare and of his own interest simply because he is taxed perhaps a little more to secure his depositors. He will be guided by the same rules of enlightened self-interest that guide the banker now. It will make no substantial difference whatever.

I hope the Senate will find upon examination that either the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota or the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota would be a wise addition to this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator from Oklahoma takes his seat I want to ask a question. It may be answered either by the Senator, who has given the question a great deal of thought and consideration, or by the Senator from Minnesota, who is, I believe, a member of the Finance Committee.

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood that he was. But in either event they possibly can answer the question.

Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota the tax is levied upon circulation. That is, the fund out of which these payments are to be made is a fund raised by a levy upon the circulation of the banks. Now, one bank may issue a circulation of a hundred thousand dollars and may have deposits of $5,000,000. Another bank may issue a circulation of $100,000 and have deposits of $50,000,000, or ten times the amount. I candidly put the proposition to both of those Senators: Why would it not be more equitable and just, if we are to create a fund for this purpose, to base that fund upon the average annual deposits rather than upon the circulation? The bank then which receives the greater amount of deposits and incurs thereby the greater amount of liability to its depositors would also pay the greater amount into the fund, in accordance with its deposits. It would seem to me that that is the proper way.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. For just a minute.

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. NELSON. There was a time in the early history of national banks when they were required to pay a tax on deposits. I do not recall now how many years ago that law was repealed, but there was such a law. However, the banks were finally relieved of that burden.

Mr. McCUMBER. That does not answer the question. We are creating a burden for a specific purpose. The burden must be borne by the banks under the present law. The fund that arises must be a charge upon the banks. The bank to be benefited will be benefited to the extent of its deposits, and if it is benefited to the extent of its deposits, then why should not the charge be made in accordance with its average annual deposits?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from North Dakota that it would be more equitable to place the tax upon the deposits. I am perfectly willing to vote for either amendment, but I think the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota has value in that it provides for the accumulation of this fund out of a tax already in active operation. It would not make any new machinery necessary. The total amount of the tax which would be required according to the statisics of the last nine years, excluding the recent panic, would be a matter so small as to be a negligible quantity, and therefore I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, while not quite as equitable as the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota, would serve the purpose perfectly well and without any harmful effect.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, there are so many serious and obvious objections to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Minnesota that it does not seem necessary to present any of them to the Senate. This is a proposition to guarantee by the Government of the United States—because that is the practical effect of it—first four thousand two hundred million dollars of liabilities of national banks and possibly thirteen thousand million dollars of deposits of all the banks of the country. It is substantially a proposition to guarantee the deposits and the loans of the men in New York who have been the objects of most of the speeches which have been made upon the other side of the Chamber in objection to the legislation which we now propose.

The failure of one bank in the city of New York with $160,000,000 of deposits would require the Government of the United States to pay those depositors who are business men, who are speculators, a sum which would wipe out the capital and the surplus of the banks in eighteen States in the Union. This legislation, if adopted at all, will be primarily for the benefit of the great institutions of the country. The people of the States of the Union are not interested in this question. They are not the depositors. I refer to the common people. The people who deposit in banks and the people who borrow the resources of banks are business men, who can take care of themselves, and there is no reason why we should run mad in this idea of paternalism. If the Government of the United States is to guarantee the contracts of one class of people, why not of all? What is there about the people who borrow money of a bank (because in the last analysis a guaranty of deposits is a guaranty of loans) and what is there about their business which requires this Government to guarantee their transactions? It seems to me that the objections to all this class of legislation are so overwhelming and so obvious that it is not necessary to discuss them at length.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can not let go unchallenged this constant assertion which has been made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] that a single failure in the city of New York would immediately involve this Government in the payment of $160,000,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. It makes it responsible.

Mr. McCUMBER. It makes it responsible for four thousand million dollars over the United States, but in all the history of the banking laws of the United States since 1865 we have not run over an average of $850,000 in a single year from all of the banks, and we can only base our judgment upon the experiences of this country. If during that period there was not an average of over $850,000—less than a million dollars—in a single year, what basis does the Senator have for assuming that we are liable to pay a hundred and sixty million dollars in a year any more than he has for saying we are liable to pay the four thousand millions in a single year because our obligation is to that extent?

We know generally and can estimate fairly well what the average loss due to the failure of banks will be one year with another. We can get an average loss in the year, and if in the past forty-three years there has been a loss of only about that much a year, what basis have we to assume that it will be increased twenty or thirty or forty times in the next few years and that we will be required to pay a sum which would take all the banking capital of all the States of the Union?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if the risk to depositors is so small, if the liability to loss is so inconsequential, why should we enter a field of so much speculation and doubt?

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not make any difference how small the liability is. The whole object of this legislation is to protect the country against just such conditions as we had during the past few months by securing a proper preventive to those conditions. Here is that preventive: To insure the confidence of depositors, so that all of the money in the United States shall be kept in circulation where it belongs, and when we shall have secured that we shall have met the very contingency against which we are attempting to legislate in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not assent to the suggestion of the Senator that that is the whole object of this amendment or its effect. The truth is that this proposes to invade the field of individual initiative and individual enterprise and substitute for the voluntary daily transactions of men the official supervision and direction of every-day business affairs by the Government of the United States. I am not ready to subscribe to the idea that the American people are not competent to conduct their daily transactions with one another without having an officer of the United States present to supervise and direct them.

Mr. McCUMBER. And, Mr. President, every year the Senator votes for an appropriation for a vast army of these men to supervise the very banks of which he is speaking. That is not paternalism?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. We send our examiners year in and year out into every national bank in the United States. We supervise those banks. They are a part of the machinery of the United States. We supervise them not only for the protection of the Government, but for the protection of the people of the United States, so that their interests may be safeguarded, and we tell those banks what they shall do and what they shall not do.

What is the difference between a bank the stock of which is owned by a dozen individuals and a partnership of an equal number of individuals? After all, it is the brains of the men who conduct the business affairs, and the Government says,

"Notwithstanding your abilities, notwithstanding your interest in that bank, we will control your conduct, and you must conduct your business according to the laws of the country, and we protect you according to those laws."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very glad the Senator from North Dakota has called attention to the present system of national-bank examinations. If that is the best function that the Government can exercise, it is not a good one. For my own part I am entirely out of accord with the system of national-bank examination now in practice and the manner of the payment for these visitations to national banks.

The Senator from North Dakota might improve the system very greatly. If the Government were to pay the examiners who go through the affairs of national banks a reasonably fair salary for the work they do, and if they were made to remain in a bank until they understood fully its operations and condition, the system of examinations would be very much more effective than at present, where examiners attempt to cover too much territory for real effectiveness.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to make an inquiry? As to the bank examiners who go around and examine the banks, is it the circulation or is it the loans and discounts they examine into?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think they pay any attention at all to the circulation.

Mr. NELSON. It is their other business. Is it not paternalism for the examiners to be prying into that business especially?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; it is not. It is a fair and wise supervision of a semipublic corporation. The banks pay these men. If I had my way about it I would put every national-bank examiner upon a good salary, paid directly by the Government, and I would not have the banks whom he is selected to supervise and investigate pay it at all. The truth is that the national-bank examiners do their work as well as they can under the circumstances, but they do not do their work as thoroughly as they ought to do it, and the Government ought to employ more men and, if necessary, pay them better for the service required in looking through every detail of the national banks of our country.

No; I do not regard such service, as the Senator from Minnesota says, as paternalism. I regard it as a very proper sphere of our activity. We have not gone quite far enough in it.

Mr. NELSON. Let me ask the Senator if, in his opinion, it is not paternalism for us to send examiners to look after the national banks when we do not send them to look after other people's business? Why do we select the banks?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because they are especially chartered by Federal law. They are the creatures of the National Government. They issue the notes, in accordance with our authority. Why should not the examiners go there? There is not a State in the Union that does not supervise its banking laws and the conduct of State banks. Why should not the Federal Government do it as to the national banks? I think we would be very lax indeed if we failed to do it, and we ought to do it more thoroughly, and as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] very properly says to me, we send agents to examine our post-offices and to examine the accounts of postmasters. No; we are in our proper field, but we have not done our work as well as we ought to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Michigan for a moment, I am glad to note that the Senator does agree with me entirely that it is not paternalism for the Government to look after the affairs of corporations which it creates. There is no disagreement between the Senator and myself as to that not being paternalism, nor is there any disagreement between us as to what should be the manner of examining the banks. But that is foreign to the issue.

While the bank may be, as the Senator suggests, a voluntary association, it can not be incorporated unless the Government says it may be incorporated. The Government passes its laws as to the amount of circulating medium it may issue; it passes its enactments as to the methods by which it shall conduct its business; and in addition to that it controls its business, with what end in view?

With the end in view that it may take deposits and that it may protect those depositors. It compels it to do business on a business basis. It compels it to retain 15 per cent, or whatever per cent it may require, in the vaults of the bank, that the depositors may have greater security; and if that is not paternalism, to compel the banks to make provision for securing the depositors, how can you say it immediately trenches on the field of paternalism if you go a step further and say, "You shall make provision to protect them absolutely?"

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. According to the Senator's own statement, the depositors are protected now; there is very slight loss. Why go further and involve the Government in all the vast details of private enterprise? This is not the purpose or spirit of our institutions, and if insisted upon will supersede individual responsibility.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I have been very much attracted by these propositions to guarantee deposits in national banks. A large number of people, many of them bankers, in my own community appear to be drawn favorably toward this proposition, and I have listened with a very great deal of interest to the arguments which have been advanced from time to time during the course of this debate in reference to it.

I regret that I have not been able to bring my mind to an agreement with the opinions which have been so forcibly expressed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], and by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. For a minute I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the difficulties which I have found in coming to an agreement with those Senators.

In the first place, I take very little interest in the argument that is based upon the alleged paternalism involved in these amendments. I do not care particularly whether the Government is paternal or not, so it is wise and just and efficient in what it does. But my objection to such propositions is of a more practical character. In the first place, it looks to me as though it would create confusion and a form of injustice to those banks which are not within the legislative jurisdiction of Congress. If we should guarantee the deposits in national banks, we would create an unfair disparagement of those banking institutions, nearly as numerous in every community as the national banks, which are not, in the nature of the case, admitted to share in these benign provisions.

It has been said the States would rapidly bring their banking institutions within the scope and influence of this legislation. I do not know whether that is so or not. I do know that in the State of Kansas an extraordinary session of the legislature was called for the purpose of bringing the State of Kansas within the zone of guaranteed banking which had been established in the neighboring State of Oklahoma, and that the legislators, after weeks of very intelligent discussion, dismissed the proposition, so far as the banks in the State of Kansas were concerned. I have seen no evidence anywhere that it would be practicable to bring the banking institutions of the State within the scope and protection which this amendment proposes to offer to the depositors in national banks.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that the deposits in banks other than national banks are nine thousand million dollars, while the deposits in national banks are about four thousand million dollars.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I thank the Senator. I have no very profound insight into the mysteries of finance, but it seems to me that if we would set up in the country this guaranty in respect to a portion, and a minor portion, of the deposits of our people, instead of being an element of stability and confidence it would be an element of confusion and ultimate misfortune.

Again, it appears to me that a bank, by the nature of its business, ought to stand on its merits. People, at least so far as my observation goes, select their bank for deposit with some consideration, at least, of its standing, of the character of the men who are its officers and directors, and of its financial and commercial record in the community.

I look with extreme doubt upon the wisdom of putting all the banking institutions of the country upon a common level of safety and security, thereby taking away from well-managed institutions the prestige and influence which they command by reason of their business methods and repute. I am afraid that in seeking to prevent a run on all banks by scared depositors we would institute a run on all well-managed banks in the interest of those who offer more alluring temptations to depositors to put their money in speculative and unstable institutions.

The Senator from Oklahoma suggested, seeing, I think, the force of that practical reasoning, that he would apply this guaranty only to the running deposits and not to those deposits put in on time and for a given rate of interest. I should be afraid of that as a practical proposition. I should be afraid that, seeing that their time deposits were not guaranteed by the Government, the banks might be tempted to use the resources of the bank to pay the time depositors and let the Government take care of the responsibility arising on account of current deposits.

So I fear that, as a working proposition, instead of helping our banking situation it would harm it and injure it by taking away from well-managed banks the influence and prestige in the community which they have earned by a record of honorable dealing with their customers.

Now, another thing. I fear also that the guaranty of deposits would operate swiftly and dangerously to reduce bank capital all over the United States. What is the object of the capitalization of a bank? If I have got hold of the right authorities, the capital of a bank is its redemption equipment, and the security of depositors in our banks now rests in the fact that they have a capital stock which is available for redemption purposes; and in connection with the stock there is a double liability to the creditors upon the shares which each stockholder may hold.

It has been said that there is only a small ultimate loss in the liquidation of failed banks. That is fortunately true, and it is an admirable tribute to the essential integrity of American business. But it arises from the fact that in addition to the deposits the creditors rely, in part, at least, upon the capital stock of the bank and upon the legal liability of the stockholders in double the amount of each man's interest in the stock.

Now, if you create a dead level of safety, if you make it out of the question for a bank to fail to pay its depositors by putting the Government in a position of taking care of that liability when it arises, where is the need of bank capital, and what, for example, would be the practical effect of the temptation which would instantly arise to reduce the capital from $100,000 to $50,000? If the Government is to pay, why should the capital be maintained at $100,000?

I think it becomes those of us who are interested in the practical aspect of the question to consider whether we would not lawfully, in guaranteeing the deposits in a bank, spread an allurement before bankers all over the country to diminish the caution and care with which sound business policy now guards the business community through the capitalization of the banks.

That leads me to say a word in conclusion. We have heard a good deal said about the origin of the panic. I do not intend to discuss that question. I agree, however, with the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I believe it is in line with the authorities that have given a practical study to the question, that undoubtedly our troubles arose from the pressure of our enterprises and our speculations and our business investments upon our available capital in the United States. It is all folly to talk about our panic here having been started by this or by that. Last September I read an article in the Atlantic Monthly by a famous American economist—an article that must have been written at least in August—in which he was speaking of the effect of the gold inflation of the last ten years upon prices and upon the state of business. In that article he pointed out the fact that long before the panic became flagrant in the United States it was pressing with terrible hardship upon every market place in the commercial world, upon England, upon Germany, upon far-off Australia, and upon Canada, and the consensus of opinion then was that the business of the world had outgrown the resources available for its management.

Hence, it has been with a certain sense of weariness that I have heard discussed here a panic attributed first to one thing and then to another, disregarding a world-wide situation, which has been under the discussion of scholars and students for the last two years throughout the world.

I do not know whether the measure which has been presented by the Finance Committee will be as effective as we hope or not. I like it, partly because nobody speaking for the so-called "system" seems to be in favor of it. I have observed affairs about this Capitol for a good many years, and I have noticed wherever there is a dreadful amount of enthusiasm over a measure from any quarter it requires only a very slight effort to uncover the interest that is seeking to promote its welfare through the machinery of the Government of the United States. When I find a bill originating with Congress without frantic friends among the great banks or banking associations, capable upon a minute's notice of attracting an adverse resolution in boards of trade and institutions affiliated with great speculative affairs, I have made up my mind, slowly but deliberately, that the Senate Finance Committee has got hold of a proposition which, without holding out the promise of profit to the banks, is in the interest of the American public, not seeking to give extra returns to special interests, not seeking to promote any questionable enterprises, but seeking in a plain way to give the American business community a supply of circulating money in times of excitement and panic and commercial disaster.

I shall therefore vote with great pleasure for this bill, and I am inclined to cast my vote against all propositions which propose to lift from the banks the old-fashioned responsibility of taking care of their depositors without calling in the aid of the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, under no circumstances could I vote for any measure that embodied a guaranty by the United States that any kind of business enterprise would be successful through the means of the Government's Treasury. Banking is only one of many business enterprises in the country. I would much sooner vote for that paternal exercise and care and supervision over the agricultural interests, or any other industrial enterprise, by the Government to insure the payment of the wages of the laborer. I would much sooner vote for a provision that would require the Government to come to the aid of the great agricultural interests of the country.

But that you should seriously propose that the Government of the United States should insure the repayment by a bank of the deposits voluntarily placed there by the owner or custodian of the money seems to me like going wild beyond all possible conception of a conservative government. Governments were not founded for such a purpose. There is not a spark of such a spirit in this great Government or in the Constitution upon which it rests as to prompt the understanding mind to carry the machinery of government into the insurance business.

The success and the perpetuity of this Government depends on its keeping out of business of all kinds—keeping out of the banking business, out of industrial enterprise, out of the management of business concerns, only holding the balance even as between those who engage in business. That is all—just holding the balance even, so that every man may have and enjoy the same rights as another man, and that every combination of men shall, combined, have no greater rights than has every individual in the country. That is the true measure of justice, and I am appalled at the seeming strength and enthusiasm behind the measure that shall make the Government of the United States the guardian against the incompetency and bad judgment of every individual in the United States in selecting a custodian for his temporary wealth.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks the United States Government ought to make the banks guarantee the repayment of the deposits of the United States Government?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not deposit the money of the Government of the United States in these banks at all, except to the extent of the necessities of the Government, through its disbursing officers, for its own convenience. Then the deposits would be limited to the current pay rolls or the necessary provision for them. I am unalterably opposed to accumulating a fund through taxation or any other governmental source that it may be loaned out to the banks. As long as the banks think that they may obtain this kind of relief, so long will they put themselves in a position where they will appear that they need it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I agree with the Senator that Government deposits ought to be very small in these banks, but I should like to ask him if he would guarantee the small deposits?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not have the Government guarantee any man's contract.

Mr. GORE. But would the Senator require the banks to guarantee the deposits of the Government?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the Government is to manage and control the detailed affairs of the bank, I might take up for consideration how far I should go, but this proposition does not embody that idea. We are not proposing that the Government shall control the affairs of these banks in the ordinary performance of their duty. I certainly would oppose any bill which proposes that the Government should control or be responsible for a banking concern as I would oppose the Government control of an iron foundry or a lead smelter. There is no reason why the Government should become sponsor or a guarantor for one more than the other.

Let us keep this great Government to its proper functions of governing the people and not engaging in the business enterprises of the people, either as a participant, as a guarantor, or a beneficiary, further than to the extent of collecting revenues through well understood and carefully enacted laws to pay the expenses of running the Government. This thing of accumulating two or three hundred million dollars in the Treasury and then, forsooth, because we have it, going into business in partnership with individuals or with corporations is a departure that I can not for a moment countenance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ALDRICH. I am sure the Senator from Connecticut would vote "nay" if he were present. I think the Senator from Louisiana would be at liberty to vote. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. FOSTER. With that assurance on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island, I will feel at liberty to vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am sure the senior Senator from Connecticut would vote "nay" on this proposition if he were here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am quite sure he would vote "nay."

Mr. FOSTER. I vote "nay."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. He is not present and I do not know how he would vote upon this amendment. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I again announce that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. Arrangements have been made whereby that pair has been transferred to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). I was requested by my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] to announce that he has a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. If my colleague were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). On this vote I transfer my regular pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state that if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr KITTREDGE] were present he would vote for this amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 49, as follows:

So Mr. NELSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire at this time to offer an amendment which, I think, will lead to no debate. It is an amendment that is satisfactory to the Committee on Finance; in fact, agreed to by that committee. It relates to a matter of detail.

On page 8, line 11, after the word "withdrawn," I move to insert what I have sent to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa proposes an amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 11, after the word "withdrawn," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the deposits under this section to retire notes secured by the deposit of bonds other than bonds of the United States shall not be covered into the Treasury, as required by section 6 of an act entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1890, but shall be retained in the Treasury for the purpose of redeeming the notes of the bank making such deposit.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, under section 6 of the law of 1890, when a bank returns to the Treasury lawful money in any form, the money thus deposited is turned over to the Treasury and goes immediately again into general circulation. The notes proposed to be issued under the provisions of this act are to be returned in like manner, but with the idea that they are not to be returned unless they are no longer needed for circulation. If they are not needed for circulation—as they evidently will not be—they should remain in the Treasury as a special fund and not be turned over to the general fund of the Treasury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "six," in line 24, page 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "four."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 6, line 24, before the word "months," it is proposed to strike out "six," and insert "four," so as to read:

National banking associations having on deposit bonds to secure their circulating notes other than bonds of the United States shall pay for the first four months a monthly tax of one-half of 1 per cent upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such bonds, and afterwards a monthly tax of three-quarters of 1 per cent upon the average amount of said notes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this currency is intended solely as an emergency currency; it is intended to be used only under a special condition, and not intended to add to the volume of the currency of the United States so as to expand it during any great number of months. It being, therefore, for a specific purpose—that of meeting runs upon the banks or great exigencies which may arise—it seems to me that we are running it too long if we admit that six months is a proper time to keep this currency in existence.

Everyone knows that the moment you increase the volume of currency you also increase the value of all commodities just in proportion to the volume of the increase in the currency. I know it is not the intention to do that by this bill. The amount of the tax is so very slight during the first six months, however, that it seems to me that it rather invites this money to be used during that six months, and as the object of the bill is not that it shall be used to do business, except for a specific condition, and that it shall be retired as soon as the exigency has passed, we can scarcely imagine an exigency demanding that kind of currency continuing for six months. I understand that the Senator who has this bill in charge is not averse to this amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no objection to that amendment, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That a commission is hereby created, to be known as a "Monetary Commission," which shall be composed of five members of the Senate, not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party; five Members of the House of Representatives, not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party, to be appointed by the presiding officer of each body; and five competent, well-qualified persons, to be appointed by the President, not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party; and each member of the said commission appointed by the President shall receive a salary of $625 per month, and all other members thereof, including the secretary of the commission, shall receive a per diem allowance, when on duty, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed $10 per day. The commission shall appoint a secretary who shall be paid a salary of $300 per month.

SEC. —. That it shall be the duty of the said commission to immediately investigate the causes of the recent panic and the relation of the banking and currency system thereto, and the relation of loans made by national banks to brokers and others operating on the stock exchange, and give the character of the collateral accepted as security, and all matter necessary to discover any abuses that may exist in or grow out of the existing system of trading on margins, and investigate as to what changes and reforms are necessary in the banking system of the country to prevent, if possible, future panics, considering the various needs of the different parts of the country and the crop season thereof, and recommend and report to the President on or before the 1st day of January, 1909, who shall transmit same to Congress with such recommendation as he may deem proper.

SEC. —. That the commission may employ such experts as it may deem proper to make investigation in the different sections of the country, and shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations, to send for persons and papers, and pay all necessary expenses incident to such investigation, including employment of stenographers, clerks, rents, stationery, and such salary as they may deem proper.

SEC. —. That a sum sufficient to carry out this act is hereby appropriated, out of the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed the sum of $150,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose that is the commission amendment which the Senator from North Carolina offered a few days ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that this is a very important matter, it being a provision for a commission or a committee, and should be very carefully considered. I do not mean to say that this has not been carefully considered, but there are many subjects which are not included in the Senator's amendment which ought to be included. I assure the Senator that it is the purpose of the committee to take that matter up and present some measure to the Senate that will cover substantially the proposition he has presented. Under those circumstances, I should be glad if the Senator would not press his amendment now.

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island whether any bill carrying that idea has been introduced?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not yet; but there will be.

Mr. OVERMAN. There will be such a bill introduced?

Mr. ALDRICH. There will be; yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, with that understanding, I shall not press the amendment; but I introduced the amendment because I am opposed to this bill. I have had nothing to say in regard to the bill so far, but I think it is my duty to give some of the reasons why I think this bill ought not to pass.

Mr. President, it has been the slogan of a great political party in this country for years in many campaigns that the Dingley tariff and sound money brought prosperity and made this country blossom as the rose. It has also been charged that another party brought on a panic. We still have the Dingley tariff, we still have sound money, and yet we are confronted to-day with the greatest money panic that this country has ever seen. Millions of men are out of employment; men walk along the streets begging for bread; and the dinner pail is empty. We may have sound money, Mr. President, but the trouble is that we are cursed with an unsound currency. There is money a plenty, and this bill proposes to issue a new kind of money. What is needed in this country is currency reform. We now have too many kinds of money, Mr. President. We have gold and silver, gold certificates, silver certificates, Treasury notes, and bank-credit money, and now it is proposed to issue another kind of money—credit money, highly taxed money.

Inflation of the currency, as well as contraction of the currency, is always dangerous, and this bill proposes to authorize certain great money centers to inflate the currency to the tune of $500,000,000 and contract it at will. We need no more money. We are trying to lock the door when the horse has gone. Does anybody suppose there is going to be a money panic in this country in the near future? The distress is upon us, but the money panic is over, so far as that is concerned; the banks to-day are retiring more than $9,000,000 of money every month, and there is a clamor among the bankers to the Treasury to retire more money.

Why, Mr. President, on the 22d day of August last, before the panic, we had in the national banks of this country more than $700,000,000 in lawful money—more than the national banks ever had before, and in all the banks of the country, national as well as State, we had more money than has ever been known in the history of America. As late as December, after the panic, we had in the national banks over $601,000,000.

The lack of money is not the trouble, Mr. President. We must get at the root of the trouble. Does this bill propose to get at the root of the trouble? It only proposes to administer upon the surface; it has even been said by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] himself that it is a patch—it is a thin patch upon the crazy quilt of our monetary system—a salt solution, to be used in case of imminent death, when death has come and gone.

With all of this plethora of money in the banks, with more money than we ever had before, when the panic came what was the condition of this country? Why, sir, the farmer was happy; labor was in great demand; everybody employed, with splendid wages; the crib of the farmer was groaning with corn; his bins were filled to overflowing with wheat; millions of bales of cotton were under the sheds ready for the market, when suddenly came the news from Wall street that there was a panic in this country; the country bankers became frightened; they could not get their money from the New York banks and other central banks where it was deposited. It was the banks that had hoarded the money and not the people. A few people in New York drew their money out of the banks in order to prey upon the people of the country. I know myself that managers of some of our great manufactories had to take the train, go to New York, and purchase money upon the curb at a great premium in order to meet the weekly pay rolls of their establishments, when the banks with whom they traded had money in New York on deposit and they could not get it back.

What relief would this bill have afforded to the country banks if it had been the law on the 1st day of last October? Tell me that it would have helped the country bankers! Why, sir, on yesterday I noticed the little city in which I live sold some $100,000 worth of bonds at a splendid premium. Where did they go? To New York. The money centers owned the State bonds and county and municipal bonds, as a rule. They are generally held by the great trust companies, the insurance companies, the savings banks, and the great central banks, and our country banks could not have availed themselves of the provisions of this bill.

Therefore I think we ought to get at the root of the evil, and the way to do it is to have a commission, because there are many different theories and ideas about what caused the panic, and what the trouble is. Let us have a commission consisting of five men of each House, or seven men, Members of Congress, and five men outside of Congress, acting in conjunction with the committees of this Congress, to investigate our monetary trouble, ascertain the facts, and report on the 1st day of January next—in six months—and give us such information that we may legislate intelligently. This bill is a mere makeshift. It is admitted to be a makeshift, and it will not bring any relief. Such a panic at such a time, under such conditions, in this the greatest as well as the wealthiest country on earth, makes the pride of the American citizen tinge with sorrow. I think we should provide against a panic—not for a panic. I can not give the measure my support.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the amendment has been heretofore read.

Mr. McLAURIN. It never has been read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senate understands it.

Mr. McLAURIN. I should like to have it read. It is a good amendment, and I want the Senate to hear it. The Senate could not spend its time better.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill, as new sections, the following:

That any person or persons owning a bond or bonds of the United States may deposit the same in the Treasury or subtreasury of the United States, and it shall thereupon be the duty of the Treasurer or assistant treasurer of the United States with whom said bond is or bonds are deposited to issue to such person or persons United States Treasury notes equivalent in amount to the par value of the bond or bonds so deposited. Said Treasury notes shall be in denominations convenient for circulation, as shall be judged by said Treasurer under rules and regulations and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. —. That instead of United States Treasury notes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, may issue to such depositor or depositors national-bank notes, gold certificates, silver certificates, or gold or silver coin whenever these are in the Treasury, or subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, in excess of the current needs of the Government.

SEC. —. That the interest on said bonds so deposited shall be suspended during the time they are deposited as aforesaid.

SEC. —. That the owner or owners of said bond or bonds so deposited may at any time within one year after the time of the making of said deposit pay into the Treasury or any subtreasury of the United States in United States Treasury notes, national-bank notes, gold certificates, silver certificates, gold or silver coin, an amount equivalent to the amount received by such person or persons and 5 per cent per annum interest thereon, and thereupon it shall be the duty of the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer of the United States to return said bond or bonds to said owner or owners. If said amount is not paid within the said one year, said bond or bonds shall be canceled by order of the Secretary of the Treasury. If an amount equivalent to one or more of said bonds with said interest is paid as aforesaid by said owner or owners within said one year, but not an amount equivalent to all so deposited by the same owner or owners, then these shall be canceled, and those shall be returned to said owner or owners. If an amount equivalent to only a part of one of said bonds with said interest shall be paid as aforesaid within said time, said bond shall be canceled as aforesaid, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue to the owner or owners thereof a bond of the same class of the par value less interest so paid, bearing the same interest and due at the same time as the bond so canceled.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury may make rules and regulations for the performance of the provisions of the foregoing sections and alter, change, or revoke said rules and regulations.

SEC. —. That if any person shall deposit as aforesaid any bond not his own, unencumbered by lien or otherwise and not authorized by the owner thereof to be so used, and shall obtain money thereon as aforesaid, he shall, upon conviction, be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or to pay a fine not exceeding $1,000.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue $300,000,000 United States Treasury notes, or as much thereof as shall be necessary, to execute the provisions of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is apparent that the consideration of this bill is approaching a close, and, inasmuch as it is my intention to vote against the bill, I desire that the RECORD shall show an additional reason for my doing so. My statement of it will be very brief.

There is no limit in the provisions of this bill to the amount of this new currency that may be retired on any given date. The $500,000,000 may be issued on one day, and the $500,000,000 may be retired upon any given day. Five hundred million dollars is nearly half of what will constitute the national-bank circulation if this bill becomes a law, because there is now only a little over $600,000,000 of national-bank circulation. In other words, under the provisions of this bill—and I call the Senator's serious attention to this—it will be possible—and what is possible is probable in times of panic or in times of business stress or of necessity, real or imaginary—it will be possible in a day to cut the volume of national bank-note circulation in two. There have been conditions and times of desperate financial speculation, with great fortunes at stake, that might prompt men, if not entirely to thus diminish the circulation, to do it at least in part. Such a thing ought not to be possible.

Why was it deemed necessary and wise to limit the retirement of the existing six hundred and twenty-odd million dollars of national bank-note circulation to $9,000,000 a month?

Mr. KEAN. I do not think it was wise.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, the Senate of the United States on the 4th day of last March thought that it was wise and necessary, and it is the law of the land. If it was wise to limit the amount of that circulation that might be retired to $9,000,000 a month, I should like to know why it is not necessary even to consider the subject upon this occasion? It is waived aside in a lordly manner, as though it were something not worth considering, and yet a year ago we filled the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the proceedings for the enactment of a law that closely considered the exact extreme limit of the retirement that would maintain the equilibrium of the circulation of the country.

I am not going to offer any amendment; but I make these remarks in order that it may never be said that the Senate overlooked the fact that in this case, in the consideration of this bill, they made no provision for limiting the amount of circulation that might be withdrawn in any given time, and that, further, they provide that the bonds upon which this emergency circulation is based may be retired upon the deposit of national-bank notes, and they do not allow or provide that the circulation based upon the Government bonds may be retired upon the deposit of national-bank notes. Now, Mr. President, I am ready to vote on this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. My experience in the last six or eight months has led me to suppose that any kind of a proposition is possible in connection with a currency measure; but I never expected the question which the Senator from Idaho propounded to me to be asked in the Senate. This is distinctly an emergency currency. It will only be taken out when there is a demand for emergency purposes. Some of my friends on the other side think it will never be taken out. Everybody agrees, I suppose, that when the emergency is over the currency should be retired. That is the plain purpose of the bill, as has been said on this floor time after time, and I do not think it necessary to state it again in answer to the Senator from Idaho.

There is one amendment which was passed over. It is a committee amendment, and has not been acted upon——

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator's argument is along the line that it would be safe to fill the cupboard of the home with poison, relying upon the presumption that no sane person would take it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; it is upon the presumption that it is safe to fill the cupboard with food, and whenever it is required take it out, and when it is not required to let it remain.

On page 10, line 5, I find that the amendment inserting the words "that the" has not been agreed to. I ask that it may now be agreed to and that the prior lines be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 24, after the words "SEC. 8," it is proposed to strike out:

That national banking associations located outside of reserve or central reserve cities, which are now required by law to keep a reserve equal to 15 per cent of their deposit liabilities, shall hereafter hold at all times at least two-thirds of such reserve in lawful money. The.

And insert "That the," so as to read:

SEC. 8. That the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to the reserves of national banking associations, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I desire to state that I am paired on this bill with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS], but if there were no pair, I should vote against the bill and vote against all amendments and substitutes for it. I am opposed to the entire legislation upon this subject.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, at the end of section 1, after the word "dollars," in line 23, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That no national banking association shall be entitled to avail itself of the provisions of this act which has charged or collected a rate of interest in excess of that allowed by law within a period of two years next preceding its application for circulating notes under the terms of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 23, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That no national banking association shall be allowed to avail itself of the provisions of this act until it has furnished satisfactory proof to the Comptroller of the Currency that none of its officers or directors are the officers or directors of any corporation which has been adjudged by any court of the United States or of any State to be guilty of entering into an unlawful combination in restraint of trade.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as shedding some light on that amendment, I wish to say that I hold in my hand a copy of Collier's Weekly. On page 12 is an article which I have had marked and which I desire to have read to the Senate. I do not know whether the charges contained in the article are true or false. If they are true, the Senate and the country have the right to the benefit of those charges, and if they are false those upon whom they reflect ought to have an opportunity to vindicate themselves. If this were a less respectable publication, I should not ask for the reading of the article, but I am sure it will be equally interesting to the friends and to the opponents of this measure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the article? If not, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from Collier's National Weekly of March 14, 1908, as follows:

MANUFACTURING PUBLIC OPINION IN FAVOR OF THE ALDRICH CURRENCY BILL.

The following letters tell their own story, without leaving too much to the imagination of anyone familiar with the most modern methods practiced by the larger interests in achieving their purposes. All were written by a man whose letter heads do not disclose his occupation further than to say "P. S. Ridsdale, Wilkes-Barre, Pa." They were addressed to a newspaper man in a distant State, whose business is the sending of such local news arising in his vicinity as is of sufficient importance to the metropolitan newspapers.

The letter, with some omissions, follows:

"DEAR SIR: I am able to place you in the way of extending your business * * * and think it will result in a considerable increase in your income. It is to obtain certain kinds of news, for which you will be paid extra in addition to the regular newspaper rates. I will be glad 'to put you next' to the work, as a good man is required in your territory.

"Very truly, yours, P. S. RIDSDALE."

The recipient of this letter answered, and in due time came the details:

"DEAR SIR: I wish to have published in as many papers as possible opinions of prominent business men and bankers of your district favorable to the Aldrich currency bill, now before the Senate. * * *

"What I want to get published as widely as you can is the following:

"That there is still such uneasiness over the recent financial crisis, that all business men of your community are anxious for some currency legislation at the earliest possible moment consistent with the importance of the subject."

(Then is advanced a long brief in favor of the Aldrich bill—a digest of the sort of thing which the hired advocate is supposed to put into the mouths of the prominent men whom he interviews.)

"Now, it is likewise the opinion of all the level-headed men of the community that the Aldrich bill, better than any other brought out, meets this urgent necessity, and there is general demand in the community, irrespective of party or politics, that the Aldrich bill be passed and become a law as quickly as possible.

"On broad lines, this is what I want: It is important to get opinions favorable to the bill from men of prominence whose names carry weight regarding the effect on your particular section, and, if they are big men, on the country at large.

"For your special efforts in this direction I am willing to pay you $10 for each story of about half a column that you can place in the big city papers, such as New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Pittsburg, Boston, Buffalo, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Detroit, New Orleans, Nashville, Tenn., or cities of that size; and $2 for each article placed in your local papers, or in any city or town papers which are not classed as big papers. You should have no trouble in landing much of this stuff. It is good news. The smaller papers in the district you cover, while they would probably not pay you space rates for the stories, would be glad to use them. You can also duplicate the stories to the big papers.

"I must ask you to send me at the same time you send it out, a carbon copy of each story, with a list of the papers to which it is sent, and then, upon the receipt of each clipping of the story which you send me, with the date of publication and the name of the paper publishing it at the top, I will send you a check for it.

"It is necessary to get this going as soon as possible. I would suggest interviews with your prominent bankers and business men at once on the subject of publication in your local papers; and then a story built up from these interviews in the big papers.

"Will you let me know as soon as you can if you desire to take up this work and what you think you can do with it?

"Wishing you success and hoping that I may have to send you many good-sized checks, I am,

"Yours, very truly, P. S. RIDSDALE.

"I must ask you, of course, to treat this matter as strictly confidential."

That is the scheme. Now, who is paying the bills? From whose pocket comes the "$10 for each story * * * in the big city papers," and "$2 for each article * * * in any * * * papers * * * not classed as big papers?" Not Ridsdale. He is, or was until recent affluence came his way, a worker on the daily papers and the local correspondent of out-of-town papers.

The Aldrich currency bill is fair subject for debate. Many speeches on it will be made in Congress, and hundreds of newspapers will print editorials which reflect their sincere convictions. Out of all this thrashing, pro and con, ought to come sound final judgment. But some one, who has a pecuniary interest in the passage of the bill, fears the result of this process of making public opinion. Who is it? Enough has been said as to those who would most profit by the Aldrich bill to justify the inference that he does not live in Wilkes-Barre. Making that small city the home and center of this "tainted news" campaign suggests a Machiavellian hand.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire merely to add that in my opinion, in a free country like this, the will of the people ought to be the law of the land. Public sentiment ought to be a powerful influence upon all legislation, and the Senate ought to be responsive, perhaps more responsive than it is or has been, to public opinion in this country. But, sir, it ought to be a legitimate, a wholesome, a rational, and a spontaneous public opinion. It ought not to be a manufactured, an artificial, or a counterfeited public opinion. In my judgment, it is worse to counterfeit public sentiment than it is to counterfeit silver or gold, and the counterfeiter ought, if not punished under the criminal statutes, at least to be exposed to the whip of justice and to the scorn of an enlightened and an indignant public opinion.

Now, sir, Mr. Ridsdale may be an honorable man; he may, indeed, be a substantial and a conservative business man. On the other hand, he may be an undesirable citizen. If he is inspired by pure patriotism, it is rather an expensive article that he is parading in behalf of this measure. But, sir, under our form of law the worst criminal has a right to vindicate himself not only at the bar of justice, but at the bar of public opinion; and Mr. Ridsdale, if he can, ought to vindicate himself in the eyes of the Senate and in the eyes of the country. If he can not, the Committee on Finance ought to have him brought before the committee and tell the committee and tell the Senate and tell the country where he has obtained the money, the source of the money, and the object to be subserved by his expensive solicitude in the passage of the pending measure.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let it be again reported.

Mr. TELLER. What is the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 of the bill, line 23, after the word "dollars," insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That no national banking association shall be allowed to avail itself of the provisions of this act until it has furnished satisfactory proof to the Comptroller of the Currency that none of its officers or directors are the officers or directors of any corporation which has been adjudged by any court of the United States or of any State to be guilty of entering into an unlawful combination in restraint of trade.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. GORE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GORE. I ask for a division.

There were on a division—ayes 3, noes 33.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is too late, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote discloses the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Brandegee	Curtis	du Pont
Ankeny	Brown	Depew	Elkins
Bankhead	Burkett	Dick	Flint
Beveridge	Burrows	Dillingham	Foster
Borah	Clay	Dixon	Frazier
Bourne	Cullom	Dolliver	Frye
Gallinger	Kean	Nelson	Smoot
Gamble	Knox	Owen	Stephenson
Gary	La Follette	Overman	Sutherland
Gore	Lodge	Paynter	Taylor
Guggenheim	Long	Perkins	Teller
Heyburn	McCreary	Piles	Warner
Hopkins	McCumber	Richardson	Warren
Johnston	McLaurin	Smith, Mich.	Wetmore

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

There were on a division—ayes 2, noes 45.

So Mr. GORE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That no national banking association shall hereafter make loans or extend credit of any kind for the buying of stocks, bonds, or agricultural or food products, for speculative purposes, which in the aggregate exceed its unimpaired capital stock.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the amendment be again reported, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate in discussing the amendment. I think it is thoroughly understood. I do not believe anything I could utter would make it plainer than the few simple words in which it is drawn, and since the time of the Senate has been long consumed with this bill I shall content myself by asking for a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, just a word before we take a vote upon the amendment. Will the Senator from Oklahoma please tell us how a banker is to know whether or not money, borrowed upon perfectly good security, is to be used for any particular purpose? That is the fatal defect of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. OWEN. I take pleasure in answering the question. Any cautious banker would inquire of the proposed borrower first what means he will have for paying back the principal of the loan. He owes it to himself to be assured of that. He also owes it to his bank; and this amendment will make it an obligation to his country to know that the money which is being loaned and which, in the matter of this amendment is the money of his depositors, is not to be used for harmful purposes.

When it comes to identifying what is a speculative loan, every banker, I take it, thoroughly understands what is a speculative loan. The buying of stocks on margin for a rise——

Mr. GALLINGER. Would not the wise banker require good collateral and be satisfied with that?

Mr. OWEN. I think the wise banker, who had no other consideration than the return of his principal, would be content with good collateral; but a patriotic banker, who has the concern of his country at heart, should not lend his money for evil purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. How is he to know that?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. OWEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the roll call begins I should like to have the amendment again read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 11. That no national banking association shall hereafter make loans or extend credit of any kind for the buying of stocks, bonds, or agricultural or food products, for speculative purposes, which in the aggregate exceed its unimpaired capital stock.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I desire to say not much more than one sentence before I vote upon the amendment. I think it is obvious to all of us that by no possibility could the purpose of the amendment be achieved by it. A banker could not know, even if he inquired, as the Senator makes him the inquisitor of the conscience of the borrower, what he would do with the money after he got it. The banker's first duty to his depositors is to make sure that he has obtained first-class security. The Senator proposes to make every banker an inquisitor into the purpose and conscience of the borrower, but that would not accomplish the end, because if a man wanted to borrow money for a bad purpose, and he had good security, he could certainly easily make and would make a false representation to the banker. So the effect of the amendment would be perfectly nil. It would accomplish nothing, and could do nothing but annoy the banker who is doing business in a perfectly legitimate way.

Furthermore, if this amendment, which is designed, as the Senator says, to make bankers patriotic as well as businesslike, were to pass, and even if it could transform a bank into a modern inquisition, still there is no penalty attached, and no person could be punished if the banker were to violate it. So if the Senator actually proposes—I do not suggest that he does not—to make effective this amendment, which appears to me to be more for campaign purposes, he would add a very heavy penalty of both fine and imprisonment for the banker, first, for not having made inquiry, and second, for having been deceived, if he was deceived. For these reasons I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Indiana to the fact that the laws already on the statute book require the directors of a national bank to observe the laws which relate to national banks in this country, and that would be sufficient as a direction upon the oath of office taken by the directors in a national bank. I introduced the amendment because the volume of speculative buying has reached a proportion which is so stupendous as to stagger the human imagination.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; but the Senator's amendment does not reach the evil. I am as heartily against the evil as the Senator or any other Senator dare be, but the point about his amendment is that it does not accomplish what it proposes to. On the other hand, it does put into the law, if I may say so, with all possible respect to the Senator, and no man has greater respect for him than I, an absurdity.

Mr. OWEN. The distinguished Senator from Indiana has assured the Senate it will do no harm.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I said it would do no good.

Mr. OWEN. The RECORD, I think, will show that the Senator said it would do no harm.

I insist upon it it will do substantial good, because the volume of speculative loans has become tremendous, and it is the speculative loans which are the very cause that produces a condition in this country such as led to the panic in October. It was the speculative loans, which went into the hundreds of millions and which used not only the reserves of the country on deposit in the central reserve cities, but went far beyond that, and which invited the country banks to place their money in New York to be loaned without record by their correspondents in New York on a high rate in a bull market and afterwards in a bear market. With all due deference to the opinion of the Senator that a banker can not tell what a speculative loan is, I have no hesitation in saying that a banker can tell a speculative loan as well as any man with two good eyes can tell the color of a black horse.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not say the banker could not tell a speculative loan. I said it would be perfectly impossible for a banker to know what use the man would make of the money after he got it on good collateral; and even if he asked the man whether he was going to use it for speculative purposes, against which we all take as firm a stand as the Senator—the Senator has no monopoly of that position—he could make a false statement to the banker, and the banker would have no assurance that the statement would be carried out.

The point about it is that the amendment accomplishes nothing and does substantial harm. If it would accomplish what the Senator proposes, it would be a different thing. The Senator is a banker, and he knows perfectly well——

Mr. OWEN. That a banker can tell a speculative loan.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That a banker can not tell what a borrower is going to do with the money after he gets it on good collateral.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senate, I trust, will excuse me for reading at this time a short paragraph from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency made in 1884, with reference to the bank panic of that year, indicating, as it seems to me, that some such legislation as that proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] ought to be enacted. At page 35 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1884 I find this:

> There is little doubt that one of the causes which led to the local disturbances among the banks, national and State, and private bankers of the city of New York, was their intimate relation in many instances to the New York Stock Exchange, and the fact that a large portion of the loans made by the banks and bankers of New York were based upon the security of stocks and bonds, often speculative in their character, which are dealt in and regularly called at the stock board.

The Comptroller of the Currency at that time was Mr. Cannon, and he suggests legislation upon the question. This extract from the report of the Comptroller of 1884 is incorporated in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1907, apparently with approval, and I read it for the purpose of emphasizing what has been said by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all I have to say. I yield the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to ask a question.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Everybody concedes that. The Senator from Texas asserts it no more vigorously than anyone else. Has the Senator from Texas thought of a piece of legislation which will effectually stop it? It is obvious, I take it, to the Senator from Texas that this amendment will not. It is offered in perfect faith, but I think the Senator who offered it must see it will not. On the contrary, as I said a moment ago, it will do substantial harm in this, that if there should be a penalty affixed to it—of course it is worth nothing without a penalty—it would lock up the banking business almost entirely, because no banker could tell what anyone was going to do with the money after he had gotten it on perfectly good security. Will the Senator from Texas present legislation on this subject that will be effective? If so, it will have the support of all of us. This will not, because it is not effective. It is injurious.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the legislation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will do some good. In supplement of that I propose, if I have the opportunity, to offer a new section to the bill, which I trust the Senator from Indiana will support, as follows:

> That it shall be unlawful for any national banking association, directly or indirectly, to make demand or other loans, or give credit on its books or otherwise, or furnish money to operators on any stock exchange to be used in dealings thereon—

I trust the Senator from Indiana will give me his attention, because I am now about to read the penalty, the absence of which in the pending amendment he has pointed out:

> Any national banking association violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $1,000, and in addition thereto 20 per cent of the amount of each transaction, and may also have its charter annulled and forfeited.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] for the remainder of the day on all amendments to the bill and on the bill.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I have been informed that the Senator with whom I am paired would, if present, vote "nay." I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. An arrangement has been made whereby my pair has been transferred to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Under the transfer of pairs already announced to-day, I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 12, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Brown	Gary	La Follette	Owen
Culberson	Gore	McEnery	Overman

So Mr. OWEN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. I offer the amendment which I read a moment ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section as follows:

SEC. 11. That it shall be unlawful for any national banking association, directly or indirectly, to make demand or other loans, or give credit on its books or otherwise, or furnish money to operators on any stock exchange to be used in dealings thereon. Any national banking association violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $1,000, and in addition thereto 20 per cent of the amount of each transaction, and may also have its charter annulled and forfeited.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. I desire to submit an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 23, insert the word "and" before the words "five hundred dollars," and after the words "five hundred dollars" strike out the words "one thousand dollars and ten thousand dollars."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the object of this amendment is to demonetize the one thousand and ten thousand dollar bills. As much as any Senator, I appreciate the humor, and I appreciate the irony involved in the proposition to issue ten thousand dollar bills during a panic, when the people are distressed for money.

But my objection to this clause is largely personal and is largely local. I am unwilling to expose the people of Oklahoma. Ten thousand dollar bills may circulate in other States, they may be money current with the merchants in the older States of the Union, but I am afraid it might possibly prove embarrassing to the farmers, the laborers, and even to the business men, and the politicians in Oklahoma, to be called upon to change a ten thousand dollar bill. [Laughter.] I mean, sir, during a panic.

But this clause has no virtue so far as the State of Oklahoma is concerned. It has a self-acting and automatic safeguard against the evil of hoarding. The people of Oklahoma will not hoard these ten thousand dollar bills, either in panic or in prosperity.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. I offer the amendment which was accepted by the Senator from Minnesota, in lieu of the one proposed by him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "SEC. 8," where they occur in the bill on page 9, line 24, insert:

That from and after January 1, 1909, every national bank shall have and keep on hand in its vaults the reserve of lawful money provided for by law. All laws and parts of laws which authorize national banks to have and keep part of their reserve in other national banks are hereby repealed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 11. No national banking association shall invest any part of its funds or deposits in the stocks or other securities of any corporation or association any of the officers or directors of which are officers or directors of such banking association. Any officer or director of any national banking association who knowingly violates or consents to the violation of the foregoing provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof in any circuit or district court of the United States, be imprisoned not less than one year and not more than five years.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the amendment is direct in its terms and requires no extended explanation. It is an admitted fact that the great ntaional banks of New York invest the funds of depositors in other corporations owned and controlled by the officers and directors of those banks. This use of the money of depositors by bank directors in trading and dealing with themselves as the directors of other corporations which they are promoting is a violation of every principle which should control the custodians of trust funds. It is a dishonest and vicious practice. No one on this floor can defend it. It is undermining and destroying commercial banking. It is converting the bank, which should be the agent of trade and commerce, into an agent for underwriting promotion and speculation. The amendment which I have offered strikes a blow at this reprehensible business.

Sir, the public condemnation of this practice has at last made some impression upon those who have engaged in it. They are already beginning to shift their ground. They are seeking to escape criticism by the organization of inside investment companies. This is but a device to cover and deceive. These investment companies will be officered and directed by the same men who are the officers and directors of the banks. One of the great banks of the Morgan group, so often named in this debate, is planning such an organization at the present time. This is plainly set forth and properly characterized in the editorial of the New York Journal of Commerce, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NOT LEGITIMATE BANKING.

The plan of the First National Bank for organizing a "security company" to hold its investments in stocks and bonds brings conspicuously to public attention the fact that for many years the principal business of that institution has not been legitimate commercial banking. Nominally it has been a bank of discount and deposit organized under the national law. Actually it has apparently been an investment and promoting institution. It has a capital of $10,000,000 and a surplus of over $19,500,000. According to the latest bank statement its average "loans" last week amounted to $113,291,000; deposits, $100,556,000; cash reserve, $25,221,700. In the weekly bank statement all bond and stock investments are included in "loans," which produces a misleading impression. At the time of the last report of condition to the Comptroller of the Currency, on the 3d of December last, this institution had $55,221,761.77 invested in stocks and bonds "other than United States bonds." As it had last week over $9,000,000 of circulating notes, an amount nearly equal to its capital must have been invested in Government bonds on that account, and it held a considerable additional amount of these. Of its $100,000,000 and more of deposits, over $25,000,000 has to be held as a reserve in cash, and of the remaining $75,000,000 and less, a very large proportion must be in these stock and bond investments, thus greatly restricting the amount of its deposits that are free for the accommodation of its customers in commercial loans, the making of which should be the chief business of a commercial bank. In other words, the bulk of the money of depositors has been used not for the legitimate purpose of supplying them with loans for commercial use, but for trading in securities for the profit of stockholders.

What does this imply in regard to the business of this great bank and of others which may have pursued the same methods? It seems to mean that its chief business has been dealing in stocks and bonds and taking part in syndicate operations, for these securities have not been held merely for the investment of surplus funds and for the income to be derived from interest and dividends upon them. The dividends paid on its own stock, the market value of this, and the accumulation of a surplus nearly twice as great as the share capital forbid any such supposition. It implies that it has been engaged very largely in buying and selling stock exchange securities for profit, taking new issues and marketing them, buying to sell and selling to buy, which comes perilously near to speculating with the funds of depositors, which is none the less objectionable on principle because it may have been successfully and profitably done. The profit is not for the depositors whose money is in large part used, but for stockholders. These may be, in an institution of the kind, largely the same set of men, who are using their own money for their own purposes, but that is not legitimate business for a national bank. The worst of it is the temptation it presents to directors and officers to use a bank for promoting and sustaining schemes of their own for money-making, instead of serving the proper uses of a bank for the commercial community.

As a criticism or a reflection this does not apply especially to the First National Bank, but to the methods of business implied in its having nearly half of its nominal loans and more than half the amount of its deposits in the form of stocks and bonds. Contrast this with one of the greatest of the English joint stock banks, the London City and Midland, which, according to the latest report, with deposits exceeding $266,000,000, had less than 7 per cent of the amount in this kind of investment, which is there regarded as a strengthening of reserves. It is said that the object of organizing a separate company to hold these securities of the First National is to remove all cause of criticism on account of the bank having such a large proportion of its funds in that form. We fail to see how that object is to be accomplished by the plan announced. It is proposed to the stockholders that $10,000,000 of the accumulated surplus be turned over to them as a dividend in the form of stock interest in the new "First Security Company," but that stock interest is to be indissolubly attached to the stock of the bank. The company stock is, in fact, to be issued to and held and voted by six trustees, consisting of the president, vice-presidents, and cashier of the bank, who will be bound to elect directors of the bank as directors of the company and to collect and pay over to the bank all dividends for "immediate distribution to its shareholders who have assented to this plan." The certificates of the bank stock will bear an indorsement to the effect that the holder is entitled to share ratably in what may be called the "beneficial interest" of the Security Company, and that interest can only be transferred with the bank stock.

This has to us very much the appearance of "whipping the devil round the stump" in the matter of investing the bank funds in stock and bond securities and in handling the same. There will be a division of capital between the banking association and the security company, and nominally two separate organizations and separate accounts; but the double institution will be under the control and management of the same men, will have exactly the same shareholders, the same directors, and the same officers, and there will be no possibility left for any independent action. So far as we can see, it may be and necessarily will be managed as two departments of the same organization, and that a national bank, controlling something that is a part of itself, but is called a "security company," organized under the laws of the State of New York. A part of the avowed purpose is the transacting by the bank "for its patrons certain lines of profitable business," including "the acquiring and holding of real estate, securities, stocks, and other property," which is not the business of legitimate banking and is in part prohibited to national banks. (The Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, Thursday, February 27, 1908.)

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not know that the amendment will prohibit this practice under some other system, but it will effectually prevent the same men from using the bank funds in dealing with themselves as directors of different corporations. They may devise some plan to evade it, but it will destroy the existing practice at least.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, from the very brief time we have had to consider this amendment it seems to me that certainly its purpose at least is both wise and salutary. I know of one bank catastrophe of a widespread nature was caused by precisely the thing which this is designed to prevent.

If I am not mistaken, and I may be, because we have had only a moment to consider it, this is precisely the situation that existed in the Walsh case in Chicago. If it is, it occurs to me that here is an amendment which in its purpose at least is distinctly advisable. Whether the language of it will accomplish the purpose which it is designed to accomplish without also doing some injury, I am not at this time prepared to say.

For that reason, because we are on the eve of a final vote, I rather regret that this amendment was not presented earlier. But from my own observation and the occurrences which have recently come to the notice of all of us certainly there is merit in the purpose of this amendment.

I merely wish to say that I should want to examine the language of the amendment somewhat further.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the general purpose of the amendment. I think it ought to be more carefully drawn and more carefully guarded. I will not object to the amendment, and it may be considered and amended later on.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do I understand that the Senator accepts the amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object to it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am glad the Senator does not. That is a fortunate solution of the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add as a new section at the end of the bill:

SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful for any national banking association to make any loan, directly or indirectly, to, or to discount for, any officer of such association, or loans to and discounts for any corporation in which any officer of such association may be interested, when such officer owns or controls a majority of the stock of such corporation, that shall be considered as a loan to or a discount for such officer. When such officer has an interest in any corporation other than a majority interest and does not control such corporation, loans to and discounts for such corporation shall be made by the national banking association of which he is an officer only after said loans or discounts have been passed upon and approved by a majority vote of the directors of such banking association. Every violation of the provisions of this section shall be a misdemeanor. Every officer who violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not less than one year and not more than five years.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. [Putting the question.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Some of the Senators sitting about me state that they did not understand the reading of the amendment, and I am inclined to think that very few on the other side of the Chamber understood it. I do not believe that any man who has had experience in banking or has studied banking will oppose the amendment if he understands it. What we need——

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask that the amendment be reread.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit me, the one thing we need at this time is confidence in banks, confidence in the management of banks, rather than more currency. An analysis of bank failures will disclose that a vast number of them have their origin in excessive loans made to the banking officers.

The proposed amendment prohibits loans to bank officials. It does not permit bank officers to loan money to themselves. It does not permit the officers of a bank to loan to a corporation in which such officer is a majority stockholder at all, or, when such officer is a minority stockholder, without the approval of a majority of the board of directors of the bank. It is a wholesome provision and I urge its adoption.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that if the amendment is to be adopted the word "hereafter" should be inserted in it, because it has never been lawful heretofore.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It certainly will not be retroactive. The Senator does not apprehend that it will catch anybody who has been in the business heretofore.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It can not be retroactive.

Mr. ALDRICH. It ought not to affect existing loans; that is my point.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It could not affect existing loans. It could only apply to acts committed after it becomes a law.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then there can be no objection to the word "hereafter" being inserted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not object to "hereafter" being inserted, though it is unnecessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment at the request of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

The Secretary again read Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it has not been the purpose of the Committee on Finance, who had this bill in charge, to revise the laws concerning banking. If we had supposed that to be our duty, we would have taken more time and presented the matter in a different way. It strikes me that it is somewhat difficult on a bill of this kind to attempt to revise the present banking system. I believe there are now laws in existence—I do not exactly recall what they are—against loaning to bank officers and to bank directors. I do not recall what limitation there is on that subject, but there is something of that kind. I only want now to say that it seems to me this is not the time nor is this the bill upon which we should undertake to revise the present system, although its defects may be great. A bill for that express purpose ought to be presented and considered when we undertake such a revision.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin explain to the Senate what the existing law on this subject is?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is no specific statute upon the subject of loans to bank officials, I would say to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ALDRICH obtained the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the fact——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the reading of the amendment. It provides a penalty which would constitute the offense a felony, and yet calls it a misdemeanor. I would suggest that he strike out the words "shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," because, I repeat, it provides a penalty that would make it a felony by reason of the penalty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I accept the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it is almost impossible, on hearing this amendment read for the first time, to say just what its practical effects may be. The Committee on Finance have already been instructed by the Senate, under the resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], to make an inquiry into this and similar questions. As I have already stated, it is the purpose of the committee to take up in some form all of the questions respecting the national-bank laws, and it seems to me that this question might, without injury to anybody, be relegated to action under that resolution, rather than to be put upon this bill. I think it would be more orderly and the Senate could vote more intelligently.

I must confess that I am not able to state just what the effect of the amendment would be upon any man who is an officer or a director in a bank; and whether it applies to every director or simply to officers I can not tell. I would suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that this amendment, which is so involved and so far-reaching, ought not to be put into this bill, and that he withhold it, with the understanding, which I am sure we are to have, that the matter will be taken up in the Committee on Finance. They are bound to take it up under the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina, and some remedy will be reported by that committee as to these various abuses, if abuses they are, and covering this very subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, this amendment is very simple. If the Senator from Rhode Island will read it he will have no doubt about its meaning. As to what the Committee on Finance may do in the future no one can tell. Judging from the past, it may be a long time before any revision of the currency is reached. Even if the Senate should take action, and I hope it may, that action must await the consideration of the House. At best it is likely to be another session of Congress—probably longer—before this amendment could be made to the law. It is important that it should go into the bill now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I really do not quite understand the object of this amendment, or, if I understand its object, I do not understand fully what its effect will be. If I caught the reading aright, it would absolutely prohibit any officer of a bank having any business relations with the bank of which he was an officer; in other words, he would have to do his business entirely with another bank. I understand that a director of a bank is an officer of the bank, and that under this amendment no director could borrow from his own bank, no matter what security he might have. To ascertain that, I ask for the rereading of the first section of the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE (to Mr. McCUMBER). Ask that the whole of it be read. The last part is more involved than the other.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the first part read. I ask the Secretary to read the first part of it, and I will tell him when to stop.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. 12. That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any national banking association to make any loan directly or indirectly to, or to discount for, any officer of such association——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all I ask the Secretary to read. That clearly prevents any man who is a director or an officer of a bank from having any business relations with his bank in the shape of borrowing from it, no matter what his security may be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am sure that the Senator from North Dakota, upon reflection, will see that he is in error as to that portion of the amendment which has been read applying to directors. The officers of a bank consist of the president, the vice-president, the cashier, and the assistant cashier.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean to say that a director is not an officer of a bank?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A director is not an officer. It is true that one of the directors of the board is chosen president of the board.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is in error. I think all directors are declared to be officers of the bank. I think the Senator is certainly in error in that, and this amendment absolutely cuts off any director or any officer—that is, any person connected with the bank—from doing any business with the bank. I simply make this suggestion with the idea that possibly we are hurrying in the consideration of this matter and have not all the same understanding of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. (Putting the question.) The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for a division, Mr. President.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 13, noes 37.

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, at his request and on behalf of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE], I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an independent section to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 12. That on or after the passage of this act no officer or employee of any national bank or trust company organized under the laws of the United States shall be a member of any stock exchange or be engaged in buying or selling stocks or bonds on a commission basis. Every officer or employee who violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not less than $100 or more than $1,000, and shall be imprisoned not less than one year and not more than five years.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which was before the Senate a moment ago and voted down, having amended it in this wise, by inserting after the word "association" the words "other than a director thereof," so that it will now read:

That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any national banking association to make any loan, directly or indirectly, to, or to discount for, any officer of such association other than a director thereof, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not wish to have it stated again. I think it is understood.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, it seems to me from the reading of the amendment that it is not very clear. An officer may be a director as well as an officer. Indeed, officers are usually directors, and the amendment will not reach the evil aimed at in its present form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee with respect to one provision in this bill which is not entirely clear to me. It is that provision of section 4 which relates to the amount of currency in circulation upon which the national banking associations are taxed. I want to inquire of the chairman in what way the Treasurer of the United States is to be informed as to the amount of circulation which any association is to pay the tax upon.

Mr. ALDRICH. Upon the sworn returns of the officers of the association. That is shown in the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is provided on page 7 of the bill. If I may inquire again, is there any check upon that return so made by the officer of the bank?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Comptroller of the Currency, of course, is aware of all the notes that have been issued. The bank is charged with the notes which have been issued, and the return of the bank, I think, is taken as to the amount which they may have, not in circulation, but in their own vaults.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, if I understand the chairman rightly, the amount in circulation upon which a tax is to be paid will be fixed or ascertained by the statement made at the end of each month by the bank officials?

Mr. ALDRICH. In such form and under such conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under such conditions as the bill prescribes?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; that matter is left to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Treasury Department fixes the rules and regulations under which the returns are made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but the Treasury Department can not impose any penalty for a false report made by a bank official as to how much of this money is in circulation.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the law provides—I can not put my fingers on the section now—but I am sure the national banking law provides penalties for violations of any of the provisions of the law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have made very diligent search of the national banking law for any penalty which will apply to this provision or impose upon any bank official any obligation, other than such as his conscience may impose, to restrict the circulation of this currency proposed to be issued to the amount which he reports at the end of the month. In other words, this money may be put in circulation and kept in circulation by the bank, and the bank will pay the 6 per cent tax upon only so much of it as they report to the Treasurer as being out in circulation at the end of the month. Section 4 of the bill amends section 5214 of the Revised Statutes. The only penalty——

Mr. ALDRICH. I will answer the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, because I want to be enlightened upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Section 179 of the national banking act covers the case. It provides that—

Every president, director, or cashier, teller * * * who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am unable to hear the Senator; and, as I have not the section before me from which he is reading, I will ask him if he will speak so he can be heard on this side of the Chamber?

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps I had better let it be read at the desk, and the whole section can be read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is another section which makes it the duty of the officer to make these returns. The Senator can also have that read if he desires. I ask that section 179 be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

179. PENALTY FOR OFFICIAL MALFEASANCE. (SEC. 5209.) Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association, or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association; or who, without such authority, issues or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree; or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association, with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am familiar, Mr. President, with that section. I had examined it with reference to this section of the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. KNOX), who is familiar with these laws, tells me that it has been held by the courts to apply to statements of this kind.

Mr. KNOX. Any statement.

Mr. ALDRICH. To apply to any statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would be glad—and I think it is important enough in connection with this legislation—to have the authority cited.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that section 4 of the bill amends section 5214 of the Revised Statutes. Section 5214 of the Revised Statutes is the section of the existing law which provides for the tax upon the circulation which national banks are permitted to issue at this time. This section amends that and incorporates this provision with respect to the circulation of this emergency currency as a part of that section.

Following section 5214 is section 5215, which imposes the penalty for failure to observe the provisions of section 5214; that is, for failure to report correctly twice a year the amount of circulation which a national bank has outstanding on Government bonds; but no penalty is provided for any failure to report at the end of each month the circulation which is to be outstanding on the bonds lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury for this emergency issue.

Now, to remove all doubt and prevent permanent inflation of the currency by this untaxed "emergency issue," I submit an amendment. It can surely do no harm and it will impose an additional check and safeguard upon this provision. I move to amend section 4 of the bill, after the word "circulation," in line 9, on page 7, by inserting—I will first read the provision as it now stands:

Every national banking association having outstanding circulating notes secured by a deposit of bonds other than bonds of the United States shall make monthly returns, under oath of its president or cashier, to the Treasurer of the United States, in such form as the Treasurer may prescribe, of the average monthly amount of its notes so secured in circulation.

I move to amend by adding, after the word "circulation," the following:

And it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to cause such reports of notes in circulation to be verified by examination of the banks' records, and any officer of any banking association falsely reporting the amount of its notes in circulation shall, upon conviction thereof in any circuit or district court of the United States, be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not less than one year and not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think that is necessary, but I have no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Perhaps we had better have the yeas and nays. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the amendment be again stated.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to an authority——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will wait a moment until the amendment is again stated, the Chair will recognize the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 9, after the word "circulation," it is proposed to insert:

And it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to cause such reports of notes in circulation to be verified by examination of the banks' records; and any officer of any banking association falsely reporting the amount of its notes in circulation shall, upon conviction thereof in any circuit or district court of the United States, be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not less than one year and not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection to such an amendment, and should vote for it if I did not think it is already covered by the provisions of existing law. The section which was read from the desk, in my judgment, covers it, and the Senator from Rhode Island was correct in stating that I believe that to be the case. That it does cover it was decided in the case of Clement v. The United States, reported in 149 Federal Reporter. The syllabus of the case is this:

An indictment of a national bank president, under Revised Statutes, section 5209, alleging a false entry in a report to the Comptroller of the Currency with reference to the bank's lawful money reserve, Held not objectionable for failure to allege that the lawful reserve exceeded the amount the bank actually had on hand.

The point in the decision is that the president was indictable under that section for making a false statement in reference to the bank's lawful reserve.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am unable from the reading of the syllabus, or so much of the decision as the Senator from Pennsylvania read, to distinguish its applicability here clearly. But whether that be so or not, the amendment which I offer will provide a greater safeguard, because it imposes upon the Comptroller of the Currency the obligation to verify each one of these reports and not to take the word of any bank official as to the amount of money in circulation.

Without such an amendment as I propose it would be in the power of the banks, when once this money was in circulation, to keep up the inflation and evade paying the tax upon it if the officers chose to make a false statement in respect to it. In Wisconsin we found that railroad presidents and officials would falsify their sworn statements respecting the amount of their gross earnings which they were required to return for taxation, in order to evade paying the full amount of taxes due the State. I am inclined to think they were as honorable a set of men as the average bank official of the country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, let us have the latter part of section 179, which applies to the report, read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Utah.

The Secretary read as follows:

Or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I doubt very much whether the section which has been read applies to this case. The provision is that any officer who makes false entry in a report, and so on——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We can not hear the Senator, and I am trying to listen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The provision of section 179, which has been referred to, so far as it applies to this question, is that any officer, naming them, "who makes any false entry in any book, report," and so on, "with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association"—that means the bank—"or any other company."

Mr. ALDRICH. If there is any doubt about it, I think the smoothest and the easiest way is to let the amendment be adopted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not see how anybody can vote against it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is what I was about to say. I think there is a great deal of doubt about it, and I can see no possible harm to arise from adopting the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when the committee had the bill under consideration the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who is a member of it, prepared a substitute for it. He was called away, and he left the substitute with me, with the request that I present it at the proper time. After consultation with the chairman of the committee I let the matter rest until now.

The substitute simply presents squarely the issue whether there shall be bank paper or Government paper doled out to the banks. The security is precisely the same, and the bill is practically the same, except to carry out the proposition that the Government shall prepare the notes and issue them instead of having the banks issue them; and that the Government shall issue them to the banks on the same conditions that it issues the bank notes to them, and that they shall be lawful money.

In the absence of the Senator from Texas I desire to submit the substitute, and to have a yea-and-nay vote on it. Then, if it is voted down, I desire to move to strike out the section in the pending bill which provides for the preparation and issue by the Comptroller of bank notes and turning them over to the banks, and to insert the provision of the substitute for Government paper instead of bank notes. If I can have a yea-and-nay vote on those propositions I will not delay the Senate by any discussion of the matter at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado on behalf of the junior Senator from Texas offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which will be read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is not necessary to read it.

Mr. ALDRICH. It has been read.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; it has been read.

The substitute proposed by Mr. TELLER on behalf of Mr. BAILEY is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That whenever, in his judgment, business conditions may require it, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in banks which have already been, or which may be for that purpose, designated as depositaries of public money, $500,000,000, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary and proper. The deposits herein authorized shall be secured as provided in section 2 of this act, and shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with their population as ascertained by the preceding census of the United States; and the deposits for each State shall be made among the several depositaries in that State as nearly as possible in proportion to their capital and surplus. The term "business conditions" as used in this section of this act shall be understood to mean business conditions in all the United States, or in one or more of the several States; but whether the emergency contemplated in this act shall exist in all of the States or only in one or more of them, the Secretary of the Treasury shall not deposit in the depositaries of any State a greater sum than the depositaries of that State would be entitled to receive if the business conditions of all the United States required the deposit of the total sum of $500,000,000.

SEC. 2. That the Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may accept as security for the deposits provided for in the preceding section, bonds of the United States, or bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of any State of the United States, or any legally authorized bonds issued by any town, city, county, or other legally constituted municipality or district in the United States which has been in existence for a period of ten years or more, and which for a period of ten years previous to such deposit has not defaulted in the payment of any part of either principal or interest of any funded debt authorized to be contracted by it and whose net funded indebtedness does not exceed 10 per cent of the valuation of the taxable property therein, as ascertained by the last preceding valuation of property for the assessment of taxes. The Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may accept, for the purposes of this act, securities herein enumerated in such proportion as he may from time to time determine, and he may at any time require the deposit of additional security, or require any association to change the character of the securities already on deposit: Provided, That in no case shall the deposits made under this act exceed 90 per cent of the par value of said securities: And provided further, That the cash value of said securities shall at all times exceed the amount deposited by 10 per cent.

SEC. 3. That each depositary receiving a deposit under this act shall pay interest monthly on the same at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month for the first six months, and at the rate of three-fourths of 1 per cent per month thereafter; and whenever any depositary desiring to withdraw the bonds deposited by it under the provisions of this act shall return to the Treasurer of the United States in lawful money the amount deposited with it under this act or any part thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to such depositary the whole amount of the bonds so deposited, or such part of them as correspond to the amount of the deposits returned to the Treasurer of the United States.

SEC. 4. That all bonds pledged to secure deposits made in accordance with the terms of this act shall be transferred to the Treasurer of the United States in trust for the association pledging them, with a memorandum to that effect attached to or written or printed on each bond, and signed by the cashier or some other officer of the association making the pledge. A receipt shall be given to the association by the Treasurer of the United States, or by any assistant Treasurer of the United States, stating that such bonds are held in trust for the association on whose behalf the transfer is made and as security for the payment of any deposits that have been or may be made with such association under the provisions of this act. No assignment or transfer of any such bond by the Treasurer shall be deemed valid unless countersigned by the Comptroller of the Currency. The provisions of sections 5163, 5164, 5165, 5166, 5167 of the Revised Statutes respecting United States bonds to secure circulating notes shall, except as herein modified, be applicable to all bonds deposited under the terms of this act.

SEC. 5. That in order to comply with the provisions of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $500,000,000; and said notes shall possess all of the legal qualities of and be uniform in all respects with the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denomination as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, however, That no note shall be of a denomination of less than $5 or greater than $10,000. All United States notes deposited and returned under provisions of this act shall be held in the Treasury to meet any subsequent deposit which the Secretary of the Treasury may deem it proper to make; and such of the said notes as are worn, mutilated, or otherwise unfit for circulation shall be replaced by new notes.

SEC. 6. That all national banking associations, except those located in central reserve cities, shall at all times keep in their own vaults at least two-thirds of the reserve which the law now requires them to hold; and in no case shall they keep more than one-third of such reserve with their reserve agent or agents.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute submitted by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TELLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARREN. I understand my colleague is paired with a Senator upon the other side, who is with him on this same duty, and that my colleague if present would vote "nay," and the Senator with whom he is paired would vote "yea."

Mr. McLAURIN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MONEY] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. If present he would vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER. I now move to strike out section 6 of the pending bill, and to insert in lieu thereof section 5 of the so-called "Bailey amendment." It is simply to carry out the purpose of the amendment to secure Government notes in place of bank notes. I will ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 6 of the bill and to insert in lieu thereof the matter embraced in section 5 of the printed amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], as follows:

SEC. 6. That in order to comply with the provisions of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $500,000,000; and said notes shall possess all of the legal qualities of and be uniform in all respects with the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denomination as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, however, That no note shall be of a denomination of less than $5 or greater than $10,000. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado, on behalf of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TELLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when Mr. BACON's name was called). I again announce that if my colleague [Mr. BACON] were present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. Were he present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and the transfer of my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON]. I desire that this announcement shall stand for every subsequent vote on the bill. I vote "nay."

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. DICK (when Mr. FORAKER's name was called). I wish to again announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FORAKER], and his pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and his vote in the negative were he present.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). If my pair were present I should vote "yea" on this question. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I beg to make the same statement that I made on the last roll call. My pair having been transferred, I vote "nay."

Mr. GARY (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). If my colleague [Mr. TILLMAN] were present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is hardly necessary for me to say that both of these amendments having been prepared by my colleague [Mr. BAILEY], if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. KEAN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

So Mr. BAILEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to make a speech; I only want to say that as a member of the committee I consented to reporting this bill. It has been somewhat amended, but not beneficially, in my judgment. There are some things that ought to have gone into the bill, in my judgment, that are not in it. I have expressed my views on the amendments which I was opposed to, and on those I was in favor of.

I regard it as my duty to vote for the bill, not because it is satisfactory, but because it is the only measure that has been presented and, in my judgment, the only one that will be presented that will in any manner meet the emergency that may possibly come before we get through even with the present disturbed condition.

If I had had my way I would have had an entirely different bill, but I think when we legislate we ought to be practical. I know very well that if we had prepared a bill revising the whole Government banking system it would not have become a law probably at this session. This is the best we can do. I vote for it hoping it will do a good deal more good than even the members of the committee who brought it in expected it to do.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I wish to explain why I shall vote for the bill, and I shall do so very briefly. As I understand it the bill is not intended to revise the general banking laws of the United States. Its main, if not sole, purpose is to provide an emergency currency to prevent the danger of and disasters occasioned by panics. It offers some defense against distrust. It does not change any principle or policy of existing law. It presents no political question. It meets no constitutional objection. If it presented an issue as to whether banks should supply the currency instead of the Government, that would prevent me from giving it my support; but no such issue is involved by this bill, as it makes no change in existing law as to the method of issue. It enlarges the potential issue, broadens its base, and compels the banks enjoying its privileges, as to this issue, to pay interest to the Government for the use of this temporary currency.

Were we to attempt to revise the whole banking system of the United States and, in doing so, to consider the many meritorious amendments that have been suggested on this floor and elsewhere, it would require months of debate, with little prospect of agreement, and certainly with no hope that the views of the minority would prevail.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] thinks we should first ascertain the cause of the panic before treating the disease. That may be true, but I fear that by the time the Senate reached an agreement on this question the patient would be dead.

There are few who do not believe that some bill is necessary. The prostration of our industries, the great decline in value of all classes of property, the distress of the unemployed, the shadow of the empty dinner pail demand some legislation to prevent recurrence of these conditions. The real issue is whether this bill or the Fowler bill shall be enacted. I think there are few on this floor who would favor the latter measure, putting in the power of the banks to issue a currency and to contract or inflate it at their pleasure and profit, and on such security as they themselves should select. It seems that the banks generally prefer the Fowler bill. They claim that the rate of interest in this bill would prevent them from making a profit out of the emergency currency. They seem to forget that in the great financial centers the rate of interest paid by their customers during the recent panic was anywhere from 20 to 100 per cent. The chairman of the Clearing-House Association, Mr. Gilbert, favors the Fowler bill, claiming that the interest in this bill is too high, and yet he says the banks took out clearing-house loan certificates, paid 6 per cent for the privilege, and loaned them to their customers at the same rate. If that be so, if they were willing to pay 6 per cent in the crisis for a substitute for currency having circulation only in its immediate locality, why should they not be willing to pay as much for real currency that would circulate all over the country? But this bill and the issue of currency therein authorized is not intended for the benefit of the banks, but is intended to be issued for the general good, to preserve confidence, and to enable the banks to pay their depositors.

Mr. President, the Republican party has been in control of this Government for over forty years, and, except during a brief period, it has had the Executive and the majority in both Houses of Congress. We have had during that time three disastrous panics, two when that party had complete and unchecked control. It has had the amplest opportunity, if it has the ability, for the past eleven years to reform the currency and to mitigate or prevent panics. It claims ability to produce prosperity and to keep the supply up to the demand, and it also claims, without denial, all the masters of finance in the United States. If these things be true why was no measure enacted that would prevent the panic of 1907? The party must really have been deluded by its oft-repeated declarations into actually believing that such a thing was impossible while it was in power. It advised the people to trust in it, and struck off from our coin any trust in God. It charged that the panic of 1893 was brought on by the election of the Democratic candidate for President. Possibly next year we shall have it explained that the panic of 1907 was caused by the approaching shadow of another Democratic success. No one can deny that, so far as legislation and administration is concerned, the panic of 1907 was the offspring of the Republican party; whether legitimate or illegitimate I shall not now consider, but it can not be denied that it was left on the front steps of the New York clearing house by its inhuman parents.

Now, Mr. President, when the majority come in here with their bill, confessing their sins, confessing their sin of omission, and attempting some atonement, striking out railroad bonds and omitting many things that they would like to add and adding some they do not quite relish, I feel that it would be cruel not to lend them a helping hand. I voted for the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and while I find I can not get exactly such a bill as I would like I am now confronted with a choice between this bill and the Fowler bill, and believing this bill to be far wiser and much less dangerous than the other, I shall vote for its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following as a new section:

SEC. 12. Upon presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury or Assistant Secretary of the Treasury by any person of any of the class and quality of bonds specified in this bill upon which money can be issued to national banks, or upon which bank notes are permitted to be issued by national banks, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to the holder of such bond or bonds Treasury notes to the same amount that bank notes are permitted to be issued thereon to national banks, until the amount limited by this bill shall have been issued.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, I am not going to make a speech. I just want to give the Senate an opportunity to review and correct its ill-considered action on an amendment something like this which I offered to the bill when it was in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I thought it had been reported to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. Does the Senator from Mississippi desire to offer his amendment now or wait until the bill is in the Senate?

Mr. MCLAURIN. I do not think it would be in order before we get the bill in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It would not be in order as in Committee of the Whole if it has been voted down.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Something similar to the amendment, but not exactly the same amendment, has been voted down.

Mr. MCCREARY. Let us vote on it.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Very well, let us have a vote on it if no one raises the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Sundry amendments have been made as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], referring to bank reserves, may be excepted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That amendment will be reserved. The question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. NELSON. I offer an amendment as an addition to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. I will say that I have submitted it to the chairman of the Finance Committee and it is satisfactory to him.

Mr. ALDRICH. It applies the same principle to reserves in reserve cities that are applied in the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to country banks.

Mr. NELSON. The amendment comes in at the end of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, and agreed to, insert:

That after the 1st day of January, 1909, all national banking associations located in reserve cities shall at all times have on hand in their own safes or vaults in lawful money of the United States or in the securities enumerated in section 2 of this act not less than two-thirds of the amount of the reserves of lawful money required to be held under existing law: Provided, That not more than one-sixth of the reserves required to be kept in the vaults of such associations shall be held in such securities.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when Mr. BACON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BACON] is paired with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. Were my colleague present he would vote "nay."

Mr. ALDRICH. I have been asked by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to state that upon the passage of the bill he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. CLAY. That is correct.

Mr. KEAN (when Mr. BRIGGS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

He is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. He informed me before leaving the Chamber that he would vote for this bill. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DICK (when Mr. FORAKER's name was called). I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. FORAKER] with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and I announce also the unavoidable absence of my colleague, and that if present he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I again make the announcement that I am paired with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], but an arrangement has been made whereby that pair has been transferred to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. NEWLANDS's name was called). The pair of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has already been announced. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when Mr. NIXON's name was called). The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I am authorized to announce that if the Senator from Nevada were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. DEPEW (when Mr. PLATT's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is unavoidably absent, but he is paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. ELKINS (when Mr. SCOTT's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SCOTT] is detained by order of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). I announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. STONE's name was called). The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. If he were present, he Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

Mr. GARY (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. TILLMAN] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). As I have stated before, I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. By an arrangement made to-day that Senator stands paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. Therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. TALIAFERRO's name was called). The Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT]. If present, the Senator from Florida would vote "nay."

My colleague [Mr. BAILEY] was paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], but I understand that pair has been transferred to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAY. I have been requested to state that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. The Senator from Arkansas would vote "nay" if present and not paired.

Mr. NELSON. I am authorized to state that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE], if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. MONEY] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. He stands paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 19955) making appropriations to supply certain additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky reserves all points of order. The bill will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SULZER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's objection does not hold. Under the rules of the House the bill will be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of the bill, and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which I have just reported.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, with Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1908, namely:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

For paper for interest, transfer, redemption, pension, and other checks and drafts for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurers, pension agents, disbursing officers, and others, $1,500.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for vessels authorized, $2,000,000.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For furniture, and materials for repairs of the same, $4,000.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $20,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SULZER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is recognized.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say in explanation of the bill that there are but very few items carried, the principal one being a deficiency item of $2,000,000 for armor and armament of the Navy.

In the first item, for paper for interest, transfer, redemption, pension and other checks and drafts for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurers, and so forth, there will be a small deficiency, on account of the change in the character and quality of the paper which the Departments have directed the Treasurer to use, as they have the right to do.

The deficiency in the item "toward armor and armament of domestic manufacture for vessels authorized, $2,000,000," arises out of the fact that the vessels heretofore authorized and that are now under contract are being completed far more rapidly than heretofore, or than was anticipated; consequently the expenditure of the appropriation has been more rapid than it otherwise would have been, and the Secretary of the Navy informed the committee on yesterday——

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. In just a minute. The Secretary of the Navy informed the committee on yesterday that there would be a sufficient amount remaining from this appropriation to pay all the contract obligations for armor, but in that event it would be impossible to continue the operation of the gun factory at the Washington Navy-Yard, which is manufacturing the armament for the vessels that are under contract. The Government is obliged to furnish this armament, as well as the armor, under the contract with the builders of the ships, at stipulated times, and in the event of its failure to do so it is penalized under its contract.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, if this deficiency for paper for the Treasury Department would have occurred if Congress had taken the duty off wood pulp?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is a question, Mr. Chairman, that I know nothing about. All I know is that the paper of the character and quality which is now being used is better and more expensive than the paper heretofore used, and inasmuch as the Secretary of the Treasury is obliged to provide this paper to print the checks for other Departments, and can not control the quality or character of the paper purchased, he simply complied with the law. The Treasurer is obliged to purchase the paper, which can only be purchased at this additional expense.

Mr. SULZER. In my opinion, if the duty was taken off wood pulp the Government would be able to get the paper which is required at a much cheaper rate and it would be a great saving to the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I only yielded for a question. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that the paper used in the printing of checks for the Government is not manufactured out of wood pulp, but is manufactured out of rags, linen, and material of that kind.

Mr. SULZER. Is the gentleman positive about that?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am.

Mr. SULZER. My information is the other way; however that may be, this deficiency is a small item. Now, I would like to inquire, if the gentleman can give us the information, why it is necessary now to pass this appropriation for $2,000,000 for the Navy Department? Why can not that go into the regular naval appropriation bill, which is coming up very soon?

Mr. TAWNEY. It can not go into the naval appropriation bill, as the gentleman from New York well knows, or as he ought to know if he knows anything about the rules of the House. It is a deficiency appropriation and can not be carried on the annual appropriation bill. The necessity for appropriating it at this time is the fact that the work in the gun factory in the Washington Navy-Yard must cease and the employees be thrown out of employment unless this appropriation is made, and also because if it is not made now the Government will not be able to meet contract obligations with the builders of ships who furnish the armament and armor for the vessels that are contracted to be built, and therefore the Government would be penalized.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand that the $2,000,000 will be used to pay the employees in the gun factory at Washington?

Mr. TAWNEY. It will be used to carry on work at the gun factory for the remaining portion of the fiscal year, and also to enable the Government to meet its contract obligations.

Mr. SULZER. I am in favor of the gun factory at Washington, and anything that will keep the men now there employed meets with my hearty approval.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I hope the gentleman from New York will permit this bill to pass without further obstruction.

Mr. SULZER. I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. TAWNEY. I said I hoped the gentleman's interest for continuing the employees in the gun factory would prompt him to let the bill proceed without further obstruction.

Mr. SULZER. I am not obstructing it, but I want you to pass the bill in accordance with the rules.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what I am doing.

Mr. SULZER. I will see that you do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The next item, Mr. Chairman, is furniture and materials for the repairs of the House of Representatives, $4,000. That deficiency was occasioned by the fact that the committees that have moved over to the House Office Building have taken their furniture with them, and the Clerk has been required to refurnish them for the committees that now occupy them.

The $20,000 deficiency for miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees ordered by the House of Representatives arises from the fact that during this session of Congress the House has authorized the appointment of employees of the House and authorized compensation to such employees to the extent of $43,000. Then there is $4,000 that has been authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund to the families of deceased employees, making a total authorization on the part of the House during the session of $47,216.07. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield ten minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I see one item here is for paper, checks, and drafts in the Treasury Department, $1,500. This is a deficiency bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What has ever become of that celebrated criminal statute we passed here once to provide for punishing heads of Departments who create deficiencies?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, it is still on the statute books.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why don't they enforce it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because there is no ground for its enforcement against this item.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because this is one of the excepted items. The printing of these checks by the Treasury Department for the other Departments is a statutory requirement. Now, as I tried to explain a moment ago to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], the character and quality of all the paper purchased is not entirely under the control of the Treasury Department. During the current fiscal year the Post-Office Department in particular has entirely changed the character of the paper used in the printing of checks for the use of that Department. By reason of this change in the quality of the paper the expense has been $1,500 more than was estimated for during this year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has that criminal statute ever been enforced against anybody?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has been enforced by the Committee on Appropriations in every instance where a deficiency estimate has been asked for, when it was not a legal deficiency, by not allowing the items estimated for.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Committee on Appropriations has no criminal jurisdiction.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not claim to have.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, that is a criminal statute.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does not somebody enforce it once in a while?

Mr. TAWNEY. Why does not the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not running the criminal department of the Government. I wish I could for about a week or two.

Mr. TAWNEY. Perhaps if the gentleman from Missouri will give his information to the Department of Justice he may secure prosecution, but I will say for the information of the gentleman that so far as the Committee on Appropriations can enforce this statute it is doing it by refusing to allow deficiencies except those that come within the law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not the gentleman promise the House that if we would enact this statute it would put an end to this performance on the part of the heads of Departments of creating deficiencies?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know that I promised that we would put an end to it, but I did say that it would greatly reduce the deficiencies. I recognized then, as I do now, that there can be a legal deficiency in an appropriation, and I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that while the deficiency appropriations in the first session of the last Congress, before this statute was enacted, aggregated $33,000,000 the legal deficiencies in the last session of Congress for the last fiscal year were only a little over $3,000,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does the gentleman know of a single instance where a Department officer has violated that statute in such a fashion as to incur the penalty that it carries?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the gentleman asking the gentleman from Minnesota or me?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Either one. Let me suggest this: I understand that that statute simply prevents any Department officer from incurring a liability on the part of the Government beyond the current appropriation, but it does not prevent a Department officer from using the entire appropriation within nine months, for instance, and reporting to Congress the situation; and an appropriation to cover out the balance of the fiscal year would be a deficiency appropriation, but the conduct of the Department official would not be criminal in the sense of the law. It does not cover cases like that at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then the gentleman's position seems to be this: That if they create a deficiency during the first nine months of the fiscal year they make themselves amenable to this criminal statute, whereas if they do it during the last three months they go scot-free.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The statute does not prevent the creating of deficiencies. The statute makes it a criminal act for a Department officer to contract a liability beyond an appropriation; that is all. It does not make it a criminal act that a deficiency may arise.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. They are required to apportion the appropriation so that no more shall be expended——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In some instances they are required to do it, but that is a matter of judgment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a matter of absolute requirement in the statute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The statute simply prohibits the incurring of liabilities on the part of the Government beyond appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does more than that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I know.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to differ with my friend from Indiana in his interpretation of the statute, but I am forced to do so in this instance. The deficiency statute does require the apportionment of all appropriations made for the public service except those that are made for the fulfillment of contracts and except those where services are required by the statutes, and with those two exceptions the other appropriations must be apportioned so as to prevent a deficiency. Then the law further provides that when this apportionment is once made it can not be waived by the head of a Department except upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or other unusual circumstance which could not be reasonably anticipated at the time the apportionment was made. Now, no one of the appropriations required to be apportioned by the statute can be waived except upon the happening of an unusual circumstance or extraordinary emergency, and if it is waived in any event the reason for the waiver must be submitted to Congress, and then Congress can itself determine whether or not the grounds upon which the apportionment was waived was an extraordinary one or an unusual circumstance. Except in those instances they are not permitted to expend more than the amount appropriated for the entire year, and if they do it they subject themselves to the penalty of the law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Just a suggestion. I think when that statute is analyzed it will be found that its penal provisions simply prevent the incurring of a liability beyond the appropriation. This directory matter——

Mr. TAWNEY. Pardon me, if the gentleman from Indiana will permit, he is referring to a different statute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It may be I have the wrong statute in mind——

Mr. TAWNEY. You have the wrong statute in mind.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But I believe I am right about it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I will occupy the whole of that time. If I can have the attention of the committee, I will try to be very brief in what I have to say. The first item in this deficiency is one I do not care to speak about. It has been sufficiently explained by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and relates to an additional appropriation for paper for interest, transfer, redemption, pensions, and other checks and drafts, and so forth, and seems to be entirely explained by him. The items under the head of "House of Representatives" are of a class for which we always appropriate. This appropriation is for furniture and materials for repairs of the same, $4,000, and is the first item under that head. That, it is said, is made necessary by the removal from rooms in the Capitol Building to rooms in the Office Building, the committees moving taking their furniture along and leaving the old rooms unfit for occupancy without being refurnished. Then we come to the next and more important item under the head of House of Representatives, which proposes to appropriate $20,000 for miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees. It seems that since this session commenced we have authorized new and select committees and we have authorized employment of clerks, janitors, and so forth, so as to increase the appropriation for such purpose over and above the regular appropriation of former years about $20,000. I wish to say that the Committee on Appropriations do not desire to have it understood that they are responsible in any sense for this additional appropriation. It simply does what it feels it is bound to do because the House of Representatives has directed the incurring of these additional expenses and to pay these newly employed people, and it becomes the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate the money in pursuance of the action of the House. But now, turning back to the appropriation proposed under the heads of the "Naval establishment" and Increase of the Navy," we find an appropriation, "Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for vessels authorized, $2,000,000." I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] regards this $2,000,000 as a deficiency. It comes in here in what we denominate "a special deficiency bill," but it is in no sense a deficiency at all, and I wish to say for the Secretary of the Navy, for the officer having this matter in charge, Admiral Mason, that they, neither of them, regard this as a deficiency.

There is no deficiency, Mr. Chairman, in this item, and if we should fail to appropriate this $2,000,000, or some sum, there would still be no deficiency in this fiscal year. It is a question whether we shall appropriate this $2,000,000 to the end that we may continue to build battle ships authorized by laws of Congress. The contracts have been let and the work has been commenced, and a certain per cent of the work has been done upon various battle ships, cruisers, and so forth. Largely these contracts were let before the appropriation for the naval establishment was made for the present fiscal year. The Secretary of the Navy and the heads of bureaus under him are simply following out what the law authorizes the Department to do. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] seems to want to arraign the Committee on Appropriations, or perhaps only its chairman, for not having punished somebody under the act of February 27, 1906. It has been stated by the chairman that that act does not apply, and he is right, in my opinion. I will read a part or all of the provision of that act bearing on the subject:

All appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes, except appropriations made in fulfillment of contract obligations expressly authorized by law, or for objects required or authorized without reference to the amount annually appropriated therefor, shall, on or before the beginning of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly or other allotments as to prevent expenditures in one portion of the year which may necessitate deficiencies or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year for which said appropriations are made.

It will be noted, Mr. Chairman, that this proposed appropriation of $2,000,000 for the naval establishment is expressly excepted, because it is an appropriation made in fulfillment of contract obligations expressly authorized by law, and for an object required or authorized, as the statute states. It is not a question of allotment at all under the provision of the act just read. We have entered upon the matter of building battle ships. Wisely or not, that is immaterial to the present inquiry. We are engaged in this work now. We are building ships, the construction of which has been commenced long ago. We are building the North Dakota and the Delaware, authorized by the Fifty-ninth Congress. We are appropriating money to the end that we may at some time or other get these battle ships completed and constructed with proper armor and armament, to be useful in case of war, or, what is still better, to be useful in preventing war. It is not a question of deficiency in any sense at all. As the hearings will show, in the statements made by the Secretary of the Navy and by Admiral Mason, it is proposed to have this appropriation in order to avoid a deficiency and in order that we may go on with work at the Washington Gun Factory here and at the Washington Navy-Yard and at other places and other stations over the country, supplying the material that the Government is required to supply under its contracts with the constructors of these ships, first, to prevent claims for damages in cases of delay, and, second, to prevent men from being thrown out of employment where they are now employed, and also to the end, which is the chief end, that we may hasten the completion of these battle ships. This is of the first importance, of course.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CARLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman how much of this $2,000,000 will be used at the Washington Navy-Yard?

Mr. KEIFER. If I had the time I would read from the hearings before the subcommittee of the Appropriation Committee. I refer the gentleman to the hearings that were taken yesterday before the subcommittee. They are already printed and will be furnished on application. They do not state, perhaps, the exact amount which will be used at particular places, but the principal amount of the money that will be expended in this preparatory work will be at the Washington Navy-Yard.

Mr. BURLESON. For the information of the gentleman, I will say that if this $2,000,000 is appropriated, it will be sufficient to meet the necessities of the Department until the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. CARLIN. There will be no further discharges made there if this appropriation is passed?

Mr. KEIFER. It is not expected to make any further discharges, but to keep the work going, to the end that we may comply with that part of the Government's obligation in furnishing armament and armor, or whatever is necessary, to have the work go on and construct these vessels and to avoid claims by contractors against the Government for causing them delays in the building of the ships as the contracts provide.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the men who have been recently discharged be reinstated if this appropriation is carried?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that there have been no men discharged. There have been some men furloughed, but if this appropriation is made these men will be put back to work again and will continue to work during the remainder of the fiscal year.

Mr. CARLIN. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no further remarks to make, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise for two purposes. First, I note in this morning's issue of the Post a news item headed—

President rakes DIEKEMA—Disapproves of House committee's action in Wilfley case—Calls Representative to account, and hot argument fails to alter opinion of either.

I shall not read the balance of the news item. I merely read the headlines and want to say now only this: That it is a part of our fundamental law that no Representative of the people shall be called into question for any vote or utterance or report made in his capacity as a Representative, and to add that our forefathers inserted that clause because it had been the habit of George III and other English kings to call to the king's palace members of Parliament and to berate them on account of their votes in Parliament; or, when members of Parliament called upon other business, to take advantage of the fact to berate them, sometimes in public, as reported in this case, and to class them amongst the crowd of "king's friends" or "no king's friends." I shall later on, the House permitting, examine into the truth of this statement, and if it be true I shall introduce a resolution to ask the Committee on the Judiciary to examine whether or not there has been upon the part of the Executive so grave a breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been for several days ill, and I am not well now. Upon yesterday, with a view of giving certain ideas of the minority in connection with the President's last message to the country, and to save myself the physical work of making a speech, I gave an interview to the press. I find, judging by the report of it in this morning's Post, that this interview has been curtailed, misemphasized, and garbled, and otherwise—oh, well, without words of complaint that are useless, and to make a long story short, it becomes necessary for me this morning to do what I have never done before, to read an utterance of my own, to wit, the real interview, to the House. I am going to read the interview as I gave it out, so that it may go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and speak for itself.

The Washington Post took the liberty to head that interview with this preamble:

It is understood to be an attempt on the part of the minority to gain considerable credit for legislation of the sort that may be decided upon by the Republican leaders before the close of the session, so that the Democratic party may gain considerable advantage in the coming national campaign.

Words of criticism from me as to the evident unfairness and animus of that sort of voluntary and attributed exordium are unnecessary, especially in view of the fact that I am informed that the Associated Press gave an introduction to it which was stricken out by the journal that I hold in my hand, and this introduction substituted for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the interview which I really gave out was this:

"Some things in the President's recent message are so immediately important to the interests of the entire country as to pass the bounds of partisanship, and to make it excusable, at any rate, if not to make it necessary, that I should say something concerning them with the view of assuring the President himself, and reasonably inclined Republican Members of the House, and the country as well of the support and indorsement or opposition of the Democratic minority."

"In so far as the things urged by the President are good things, I would like the country to know that all he has to do is to deliver twenty-nine Republican House votes in favor of them. These conjoined with the solid Democratic vote will put them through." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"I was sorry to note in the President's message the absence of reference to a campaign contribution publicity bill, giving names, post-office addresses, and amounts of contributions, and providing for their publication before the election. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In past messages, however, he has urged this, and it is therefore well, perhaps, that I should say that the virtually solid Democratic vote will be behind legislation of this sort within constitutional limit."

"The Democratic party has ever been a friend of all legitimate demands of labor, and has therefore stood for constitutional regulation of child labor, not only in the interest of labor generally, but in order that the fathers and mothers of the next generation may be physically and mentally fit progenitors of the generation to succeed them." [Applause.] I shall ask gentlemen not to applaud, because it will take the whole of my time to read this, and, as I have already announced I would object to unanimous consent for others to extend, I could not, of course, expect that courtesy to me. "The following quotation from the President's message, therefore, meets with our hearty approval:"

> Child labor should be prohibited throughout the nation. At least, a model child-labor bill should be passed for the District of Columbia. It is unfortunate that in the one place solely dependent upon Congress for its legislation there should be no law whatever to protect children by forbidding or regulating their labor.

"The first sentence requires more particular notice. Child labor ought to be prohibited throughout the nation, but the States are the sole authorities having constitutional power to prohibit it within the States. If those who would protect the children of the land, and through them the generations to come, would waste less of their time and energy in the useless agitation for invalid and unconstitutional Federal legislation and would devote more of their time to that purpose in the several States it would be better for all."

"The holding out the hope of some efficient Federal legislation merely wastes and dissipates energies of those who are devoted to the cause. Nothing more absurd than the Beveridge child-labor law was ever offered to Congress. To say that a given product should not pass through interstate commerce because it was manufactured in a factory where children were employed, and are permitted by the State law to be employed, is a stretch of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution no less strenuous and no less ridiculous than a law which should say that a divorced man or woman should not travel upon an interstate-commerce passenger ticket unless the State law under which the divorce had been granted met with the approbation of the Federal Government."

"But the President is right in saying that we can act for the District of Columbia, and I will add for the Territories as well, and that we ought to do it. Those who are always complaining of the ineffectiveness of State legislation and imagining that Federal legislation is a cure-all are singularly rebuked by the spectacle of the condition of legislation not only in the District of Columbia, but in the Territories, where Congress has almost full legislative power. Perhaps the worst corporation laws in the Union, outside of New Jersey, are in Arizona, and perhaps the poorest labor laws anywhere are in the District of Columbia."

"I was glad to see in the President's message the following clause:"

> I renew my recommendation for the immediate reenactment of an employers' liability law, drawn to conform to the recent decision of the Supreme Court. Within the limits indicated by the court, the law should be made thorough and comprehensive.

"There is no excuse for the delay upon the part of the Republican members of the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives in reporting out an employers' liability law. Their delay at least arouses, if it does not justify, a suspicion that they are having a lot of useless hearings simply for the purpose of using that bill as a buffer to prevent the serious consideration of other bills pending before the committee. For example, the Clayton bill to put an end to temporary restraining orders of Federal courts granted on mere ex parte corporation testimony, invalidating State laws, and the various bills there pending to recognize the police power of the States in dealing with alcoholic stimulants when introduced into prohibition territory and to use the interstate-commerce power of Congress as auxiliary to the enforcement of State policy. I have given notice in the House that no legislation shall be enacted by unanimous consent until an employers' liability bill is at least reported for the consideration of the House. The President can be assured of the absolute support of the unanimous minority in this matter."

"The succeeding clause of his message also meets with unanimous Democratic approval:

> In addition to a liability law protecting the employees of common carriers, the Government should show its good faith by enacting a further law giving compensation to its own employees for injury or death incurred in its service. It is a reproach to us as a nation that in both Federal and State legislation we have afforded less protection to public and private employees than any other industrial country of the world.

"I have had several cases called to my attention where constituents were injured in the service of the Government and where no sort of recourse or remedy exists, not even where the injury occurred through gross negligence upon the part of the governmental authorities.

"There are very few, if any, Democrats in the House who do not indorse the next quotation which I shall make from the President's message, to wit:

> No temporary restraining order should be issued by any court without notice; and the petition for a permanent injunction upon which such temporary restraining order has been issued should be heard by the court issuing the same within a reasonable time—say, not to exceed a week or thereabout from the date when the order was issued.

"This is especially applicable to temporary restraining orders setting aside upon a mere ex parte hearing the solemn law of a sovereign State deliberately enacted. I have given notice in the House that until Congress is given an opportunity to vote upon this proposition no legislation by unanimous consent shall occur. I am sorry that the President could not see his way to go one step further, and to say that where a constructive contempt of court is committed; that is to say, a contempt not in the presence of the court—the party alleged to have committed it shall, before being deprived of liberty or property, be entitled to a trial by jury. Of course, I take it that nobody will understand the President or me to mean that there should be any limit upon temporary restraining orders when issued for the purpose of preventing immediate and otherwise unavoidable destruction of property or of life or limb. When I say property I do not mean judicially construed "property rights," but property."

The President says in another part of his message that "nothing should be done to legalize a blacklist or boycott that would be illegal at common law." So say we all of us, but it is a sad commentary upon this utterance of his that while the Federal courts have held that a "boycott" is a combination in restraint of trade, and therefore illegal, other Federal courts have virtually upheld the employer in his assertion of a right to blacklist, because one Federal court went so far as to say that because the employer had a right to discharge without giving any notice at all, that therefore he had a right to discharge because the man discharged was a member of a labor union! It is a poor rule that does not work both ways."

"Another decision of a Federal court, the decision by Judge Gould, has gone so far as to say that a labor union newspaper should not publish the name of a firm under the heading, "We do not patronize." There ought to have been no quarrel with the decision that the journal had no right to publish the name of an individual or firm under the heading "Unfair list," because the very use of the word "unfair" might have been in itself slanderous or libelous—was, at any rate, insulting. But that any body of men have not the right to publish a list of the people whom they do not propose to patronize has seemed to me to be going very far. The analogy of the decision in the Federal court in the case that I have previously referred to might have applied. A man has a right to patronize or not to patronize anybody, according to his own sweet will, and he therefore has the right to publish the names of those that he does not patronize. It makes no difference what reason he may give, provided the reason given is not insulting, slanderous, libelous, or injurious in its character."

"The next clause from the President's message, to wit:"

> I am of the opinion, however, that one change in the tariff could with advantage be made forthwith. Our forests need every protection, and one method of protecting them would be to put upon the free list wood pulp, with a corresponding reduction upon paper made from wood pulp, when they come from any country that does not put an export duty upon them—

"meets with Democratic approval, except that it does not go quite far enough. Not only ought wood pulp to be placed upon the free list, but print paper ought to be placed there also.

The publishers and readers will not be very much benefited if wood pulp be placed upon the free list if at the same time there be only a slight reduction of the duty upon print paper. Both should go there, not only in the interest of the preservation of our forests, but in the interests of the cheap dissemination of ideas. The world grows and civilizes and refines itself by the dissemination of ideas, and every tax upon intelligence is a relic of barbarity."

"I am sorry to see that the President did not follow this up by a recommendation for free works of art as well, because these, too, are refining agencies, it being almost as important to cultivate the taste of a people as it is to cultivate the growth of information among them."

"I do not know whether the majority of the Democratic party will indorse the President's utterances in favor of a permanent Waterways Commission or not. I myself have long been of the opinion that we ought to have a "board of public works," which would include not only the waterways, but public buildings. Congress should make a lump-sum appropriation each year and the waterways and public buildings should be provided for out of that sum by the board of public works, thus relieving Congress not only of much unnecessary work but of a great deal of logrolling. [Applause.] Every rivers and harbors bill and every public buildings bill, must necessarily carry upon it a few unworthy projects in order to gain the number of votes in the House and Senate necessary to put it through. This country ought to appropriate $50,000,000 a year for waterway improvements, and not less than $10,000,000 a year for public buildings, and the distribution of this amount ought to be made, not for the purpose of strengthening a bill in the House or Senate by getting votes for it, but in the interest of real economical progress. We can spare the money by curtailing military expenses and waste."

"One more clause in the President's message meets with my unqualified approval. It is this:

> Numerous bills granting water-power rights on navigable streams have been introduced. None of them give the Government the right to make a reasonable charge for the valuable privileges so granted, in spite of the fact that these water-power privileges are equivalent to many thousands of acres of the best coal lands for their production of power. Nor is any definite time limit set, as should always be done in such cases. I shall be obliged hereafter, in accordance with the policy stated in a recent message, to veto any water-power bill which does not provide for a time limit and for the right of the President, or of the Secretary concerned, to fix and collect such a charge as he may find to be just and reasonable in each case.

"Personally, I applaud that. In a bill concerning the disposal of certain water powers in the State of Washington, I voted unavailingly in the negative, although I thought it right not to interpose an objection to unanimous consent, which would have prohibited the fair and full consideration of the measure by the House. In that vote and fight against the bill I was joined by a large majority upon the minority side of the House, and the bill passed by only a small majority. In another case in the last Congress I voted and spoke against a bill which was to turn over to a private corporation the right to canalize certain streams in the State of Pennsylvania. It seemed to me wrong then, as it seems to me now, to set the precedent of turning over the water routes of the country or any part of them for navigation or for power purposes to private corporations, with a right to charge toll thereupon. If a work of canalization be sufficiently important to receive Federal notice at all on the ground that it is productive of benefit to interstate commerce, then it ought to be sufficiently important to secure the doing of the work by the Government and its free use by the people."

"There are objectionable things in the President's message as one might naturally expect, considering his education in the line of Hamiltonianism and his ingrained tendencies toward Federalism—things which can not meet with Democratic approval. One of them is his idea that the Attorney-General, representing the Government, should have the right to nominate receivers when a common carrier is thrown into the hands of a receiver. That right ought to rest in the court and not in the Executive, nor in any representative of the Executive. It is a judicial proceeding, and a separation of the executive and judicial powers ought to be preserved. The court has the right and the power now to avoid the evil which the President deprecates, and any judge who would, to use the President's language, "appoint as receiver the very man or men the failure of whose policy may have necessitated the creation of the receivership" is corrupt or conniving and ought to be impeached. That it is sometimes done is no doubt probably true, but the right way to correct the evident wrong is to bring public opinion to bear upon the judges who allow themselves thus to be dictated to by manipulators of large concerns, who in many cases have so manipulated them as to make the stockholders and the general public both lose money, while they—the manipulators—alone have made it."

"The President's utterances concerning the antitrust law are an indication of his utter and innate inability to see that which will appear plain to a Democratic mind, to wit, that anything approximating a private monopoly is intolerable and unendurable under a free government. His attempt, and that of others, to classify trusts and monopolies as "good trusts" and "bad trusts" is abhorrent. There can be no such thing as a good trust. There have been good emperors, but never a good empire; good kings, but never yet a good monarchy, simply because one-man power, whether exerted benevolently or malevolently, is contrary to Democratic instinct; and that instinct is right, because even the best of men with too much power grow worse than they were before they were tempted by power. So there may sometimes be a good trust magnate who uses his powers benevolently, but the power is too much fraught with danger to be vested in one man or a few men. No wonder his late message has been welcomed on the Wall street curb as 'a truce in his fight on combinations,' and that rumors are afloat that large campaign contributions are resulting."

"I am sorry to see that the President did not cut the Gordian knot presented by the late decision of the Federal court, virtually declaring labor unions to be trusts, in a perfectly frank way. We ought simply to enact a law saying that "farmers' unions or associations, formed for the purpose of improving agricultural methods, increasing the quantity of crops, decreasing the expenses of marketing them, improving the quality of crops, and stabilizing the price of agricultural products shall not be construed to fall within the inhibitions of any existing law." The debates in both Houses at the time the antitrust measure was adopted show that this was the clear intention of Congress, and the court will be exceedingly technical, indeed, if it subjects them, as it has virtually subjected labor unions, to the operation of a law that was never intended to cover them. The same statement is true as to labor unions. Labor unions are legalized in Great Britain and in every other free country, and as the President's own message—this very one—proves, have been legalized here. We ought simply to provide that "organizations of labor and workingmen for the purpose of securing shorter hours of labor or higher pay or more equitable treatment shall not be construed to fall within the inhibition of any existing law so long as the methods pursued by them are peaceable and orderly." There is no danger of monopolistic abuses in connection with farmers' unions or labor unions."

"Agriculture is the basic industry of the world and progress is very largely measured by comparison of the condition of agriculture from time to time in any given country whose history or condition is being considered. From the very nature of the farmer's pursuits he can not form a monopolistic association. Again, the progress and civilization of the world depend very largely upon the world's going on from day to day increasing its output of product per man while shortening its hours of labor; and, in our free Republic especially, the success of our democratic experiment very largely depends, and must depend, upon placing the common people, including the workingmen, upon a plane of intelligence and refinement which shall render them capable of self-government, and this can never occur as long as they are brutalized by hours of labor too long or by rates of pay too low, thus leaving them without means of leisure to improve their minds and to refine their souls. As Sir Matthew Hale said years ago:"

> Time may properly be divided into three equal parts: eight hours for sleep, eight for work, and eight for worship, edification, and amusement.

"Our experiment in democratic government will prove a failure and Macaulay's prophecy be fulfilled when we once reach a condition of very dense settlement all over the country, with millions more than we have now of wageworkers, unless these workingmen shall work under conditions such that their labor shall not brutalize them and shall not prevent them from rendering themselves sufficiently intelligent as citizens to be sound judges of the public good and not mere envious seekers for class domination. Every effort to prevent the American workingman from improving his condition and by peaceful association raising himself to a higher plane leaves in control of labor opinion the foreign element of the workingmen, who do not comprehend our institutions, and that class of our native workingmen, as well, who are ignorant and illiterate; in a word, the enemies of all government who strike out with their blind fists against the limitations of comparative poverty.

"During the consideration of the penal code in the House an effort was made by several Democrats to forestall the very construction which has just been placed upon the law by the Supreme Court. It met with united Republican opposition. No man who loves his country is in favor of permitting laboring men or any other class of men to resort to violence or to take the law into their own hands or to set themselves aside as a ruling class to intimidate legislation or legislators in any way. But, nevertheless, every man who loves the cause of the democratization of the world will solve points of doubt in favor of the weak and the laboring. Those of us who have never had to labor with our hands and who have been able to give our minds up to improvement of intellect or to amusement are the very men of all men who ought to be most careful not to permit a feeling of hopelessness and helplessness and blind envy to sink into the hearts of our workingmen." [Applause.]

"The President's idea of letting the substantive part of the antitrust law remain as it is, but giving to some branch of the Executive Government authority to determine when a trust is a good trust and when it is a bad one—in effect to license one and to restrain another—is so very vicious in its ultimate effects, if adopted, that it would seem that no friend of a well-ordered government could stand for it. Already we have a law upon the statute books making it the duty of the Bureau of Corporations to collect certain evidence concerning corporations, and then we have a provision of that law making it discretionary with the President of the United States whether or not the evidence thus collected shall be published for the use of Congress and the people. If you add to that and to the arbitrary power now existing in the Post-Office Department concerning the mailability of newspapers and magazines, the further arbitrary power to be lodged in an executive officer to hold a big stick over all sorts of combinations and trusts; to say to one, "You may operate," and to another, "You shall not operate," we shall have made the very longest single stride ever taken in the history of this country in behalf of the arbitrary government of men as distinguished from the prescribed government of laws. What a campaign-fund begetter it would be!"

"As to the President's proposition for tariff revision by investigation and consideration at the hands of a commission composed of Members of the House and Senate and five so-called "experts," it is both cumbersome and useless. Aye, it is worse than that. It would be fraught with necessary evil. Men who are designated by Republicans to be tariff experts are always men who are engaged in certain industries protected under the tariff, and they are "expert" in knowing just what measure of duties it is necessary to have in order to enable them to exploit the consumers of their product under the shelter of tariff legislation. Nobody is ever recognized as an "expert" upon tariff questions except somebody who is interested in maintaining a tariff tax. Besides that the plan is a reflection upon the intelligence of the House of Representatives. The very best possible tariff commission is a commission consisting of the representatives of the people selected by the people, supposedly in the interest of the people. Even that body has too many men really and concealedly selected by private interests in the interest of private interests. If the Republican party can not furnish a Ways and Means Committee with sufficient intelligence to revise the tariff, then will it surrender the reins of power to us of the minority and let us see whether we can or not? At any rate, we are not willing to confess beforehand that we can not.

The Republican slogan has been a "revision," and here of late, since the Illinois idea has come into play, an "adjustment" of the tariff "by the friends of the tariff." In the name of God, when will the tariff ever have more friends in legislative halls than right now? A good, big, easily controlled majority in the House of Representatives, obedient to every nod of the four or five Republican leaders; a two-thirds majority in the Senate, and a unanimous and impulsive majority in the White House, ought to be sufficient. Why wait on a commission? Why not proceed now? Why wait until after the election? Why not prove to the people by a bill formulated before the election that the Republican party has the wisdom and patriotism to confront the actual and crying situation? Can it be that Republican leaders here are aware of the fact that any tariff concocted in their Committee on Ways and Means and enacted by their House of Representatives, if promulgated and made known before the election, would be so vicious in its provisions as to lead the people of the United States to thrust the Republican party "by crop and by neck" out of power? I make no such charge as that. I can not believe that we have fallen upon such evil days. But I do submit that this constant halting and backing and filling and suggestion of one device after another to prevent prompt and effective action upon a great subject—some action in connection with which is everywhere admitted to be wise—is rather an argument that Republican leaders, at any rate, entertain that view, which I would scorn, as an American patriot, to express, even concerning them. [Loud and long continued applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

For paper for interest, transfer, redemption, pension, and other checks and drafts for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurers, pension agents, disbursing officers, and others, $1,500.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I rise for the purpose of explaining to the House at this time the suggestion which was made by the distinguished leader of the minority, the gentleman from Mississippi. In beginning his remarks this morning he said he arose for two purposes, and the first of those purposes to which he referred was an article appearing in the Washington Post this morning headed:

President rakes DIEKEMA—Disapproval of House committee's action in Wilfley case—Calls Representative to account, and hot argument fails to alter opinion of either.

Then there are certain references to King George and his tyranny, and the gentleman closes by saying that he will hereafter introduce a resolution in order that it may be determined whether or not the privileges of the House of Representatives have been infringed upon by the executive branch.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I want him to get my statement correctly. I said I would do that if I found that the substance of what was reported occurred was what did occur.

Mr. DIEKEMA. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I will rely upon the gentleman as a witness as to that.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Exactly; and inasmuch as I do not think it would be just to President Roosevelt to let this statement go out to the people without a denial at the present time and thus do an injustice which a subsequent statement might not fully cover, I rise now to give the gentleman from Mississippi that full explanation which a subsequent resolution and investigation would elicit, this being what I consider my duty; and if I should remain silent at this time, it would be a cowardly neglect of duty and an injustice to the Chief Executive.

Now, let me say, in the first place, that the President did not send for me. That statement is an entire mistake. I went to the Executive office for the purpose of introducing to the President Governor Warner, of my State, and as we were conversing incidentally this subject came up for conversation, the President insisting that he believed that the report of the committee, which has now been made public by the subcommittee, relating to the investigation of Judge Wilfley would do that judge an injustice, and would, in his opinion, interfere with the administration of justice and the prestige of the American nation in China. On the other hand, I endeavored to explain, as best I could, to the Chief Executive the report which the committee had made. I explained to him the grounds upon which our conclusions in that report rested. I endeavored to explain to him why we arrived at these conclusions of law and of fact; and, Mr. Chairman, not only did he not act as George the Third would have acted, in a spirit of intolerance, but he gave to me all the time I desired to present to him fully the position of the subcommittee which had made the Wilfley report. He did not agree with our conclusions. I did not agree with his conclusions. The President of the United States had a perfect right to debate this question with me and to learn upon what grounds we had based our report. As a Member of the House I had a perfect right to defend our position, and in a spirit of the utmost liberality and of the utmost consideration for me as a Member of the House, in a spirit of the utmost tolerance, the great President of the United States recognized the right of a Member of this House to debate with him the right of the matter as we assert it to be; and never in all that discussion did he display the least symptom of intolerance, but, on the contrary, the broadest spirit of American tolerance, such as has made our country great, and such as has exemplified the deeds of the President in the history of his past career. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Did or did not this occur at the meeting?

That the President thought when the members of the subcommittee took up the case of Judge Wilfley they should have gone no further than to find that the basis of the charges against him did not constitute an impeachable offense, and let it go at that.

Mr. DIEKEMA. It did not occur.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the gentleman if this occurred, because I am anxious to get at the facts, and I am perfectly willing to take the gentleman as my own witness:

The President is understood to have thumped on the desk to emphasize his points; so did Mr. DIEKEMA.
